HISTORY

OF THE

LAW OF REAL PROPERTY

DIGBY
London

HENRY FROWDE

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE

AMEN CORNER
AN INTRODUCTION TO THE HISTORY
OF THE
LAW OF REAL PROPERTY
WITH ORIGINAL AUTHORITIES.

BY KENELM EDWARD DIGBY, M.A.
Of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law, Late Vicerean Reader in English Law, and formerly Fellow of Corpus Christi College in the University of Oxford

Third Edition

Oxford
AT THE CLARENDON PRESS
1884
[All rights reserved]
PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.

My object in undertaking this work was to attempt in some degree to supply a want which at present greatly impedes the study of English law at the Universities. There is no really elementary work on the English law of real property adapted for the use of students who have not and may never have any practical experience in the working of the law. Almost all elementary books have been written from the professional rather than from the educational point of view; excellent as many of them are as introductions to a practical knowledge of law, they are scarcely available for purposes of legal education at an University. Blackstone’s treatise stands almost alone in adequately satisfying both demands. It has been the fashion of late to dwell on the defects rather than on the merits of that great work, and there are obvious reasons why it fails to satisfy the requirements of the present time. Nevertheless Blackstone still remains unrivalled as an expositor of the law of his day. Throughout the following pages his work is referred to as at once the most available, and the most trustworthy authority on the law of the eighteenth century.

In considering the mode in which the elementary principles of the important branch of English law, which is the subject of this treatise, can best be dealt with, there can be little question that it is necessary to begin by sketching the history and development of rights over land. Hardly one of the main classifications of these rights which is recognised at the present day—the distinction, for instance, between the legal and the equitable interest, the notion of an estate in lands with its consequences, as distinct from property in things personal, the distinction between freehold, leasehold, and copyhold tenure—can be explained without tracing if possible the origin, at all events the development, of the conceptions on which it is based. It seems therefore necessary to start from the earliest elements of English law, and to trace the development by the action of the tribunals and of legislation of the germs which are found in our earliest authorities, till we are at last enabled to give something like a systematic classification of the congeries of ancient custom and mediaeval and modern innovation called the law of real property. It seems best, in the first instance, to trace the growth of the law chronologically till the period is reached at which the structure has attained its permanent features, when an attempt may be made to arrange its various branches systematically; it being always borne in mind that the nature and attributes of the various classes of rights are to be accounted for by reference rather to their history than to any principles of jurisprudence. This stage in the history of English law appears to me to have been reached before the reign of Henry VIII. I have attempted in the Appendix to Part I, Tables I, II, and III, to arrange systematically the main branches of the law of land as it stood at the commencement of this reign. It will be seen that much of this classification is taken from Blackstone, who followed one of the greatest of English lawyers, Sir Matthew Hale.

In the arrangement summarised in Table I, as will be seen, I am largely indebted to Mr. John Austin's Lectures on Jurisprudence. The remarkable analysis of juristic conceptions which he instituted, but unfortunately left incomplete, is, as it seems to me, a κρήμα ἐς ἀεί; it is, in great part, work done which must enter largely into the basis of any attempt to recast English law on true principles of systematic arrangement.
Part II of this work treats mainly of the growth of the two branches of the law of real property which are of the greatest importance in modern law, the history and development of Uses and Trusts, and of Wills of land. The former is perhaps the most curious and important chapter in the history of the law of land. The extreme technicality of our modern law, the mysteries of conveyancing, and the anomalous opposition of Equity and Law, are mainly due to the unhappy piece of legislative reform called the Statute of Uses. It is this Statute, with the marvellous interpretations to which its provisions have been subjected, which renders any real simplification of the law of real property impossible, without a more thorough rebuilding of the whole structure from its foundations, and substitution of a systematic or scientific for a historical classification, than is at all likely to be undertaken at present. Here, therefore, it is necessary to pursue the same method as in Part I, and to attempt first to trace the development of the law, and then to summarise and arrange it under the principal classes which are due to the historical causes whose action has been discussed. This I have attempted to do in the last chapter on 'Titles.'

My object throughout has been to attempt to explain the leading principles of the law as it exists at present by reference to its history. For antiquarian research I am painfully conscious that I have neither sufficient knowledge nor leisure. I have endeavoured to state with accuracy such matters connected with the antiquities of our law as are necessary to explain its later developments, or as seemed to possess an intrinsic interest so great that the omission of them from an outline of the history of the law of land would not be justified. I have endeavoured on the same principle to select the original authorities which form the backbone of this treatise. Experience abundantly proves that no account can give so vivid and trustworthy a picture of the history of law as the original authorities themselves. For the purposes of legal education they are of the utmost value. But so little attention has been paid to the abundant materials we possess, they still exist for the most part in so inaccessible a form, that they can hardly be said to be available to the student. The principal statutes bearing on real property are sufficiently conspicuous. In the selection of extracts from text-writers and reported cases there was more difficulty. The extracts from Bracton occupy a large space. This is, I hope, justified by their intrinsic interest and by the historical importance of the work of that great lawyer, the merits of which have, I think, been somewhat underrated.

The difficulty which perpetually encounters those who have to give instruction in law to University students is this—where is the line to be drawn between principle and detail? what is the point to which the teacher can usefully go without burdening the student with minor rules which, however important as pieces of professional knowledge, are useless for educational purposes? This is a question which every one who has to encounter the difficulty in practice must solve for himself. In the present work I have endeavoured to draw the line at the point to which, as it seems to me, University students, even if they enter upon the study not as preparatory to the practice of the profession, but as forming part of a liberal education, might properly be brought.

The proofs of the first chapter were already revised before the appearance of the first volume of Mr. Stubbs' excellent and learned Constitutional History. I was, however, enabled to insert several references to his work, and in one or two cases to introduce some modification into the text. I have also to thank him and other friends for some valuable suggestions and criticisms on the first chapter.

I have refrained from over-burdening the notes with references to authorities. It will be seen that I throughout refer to Blackstone as the great authority on the earlier law, and to the admirable work of Mr. Joshua Williams as the most available treatise on the law of the present day. I have only inserted such references to other works, as appeared to me to be proper in order to introduce students to the leading authorities to be found in any fairly furnished law library.

1 Paper Buildings, Temple, January 15, 1875.

PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION.

The present edition contains a few alterations and additions rendered necessary by various Statutes affecting the Law of Real Property, which have been passed since the publication of the second edition. Of these the most important are the 'Act to amend the Law as to Contingent Remainders' (1877), the Conveyancing Acts 1881 and 1882, the Settled Land Act 1882, and the Married Women’s Property Act 1882. The main changes in point of principle effected by these statutes consist in the altered position of Married Women as regards their rights of acquiring, holding, and disposing of land; and the increased power of disposition now given to Tenants for life. The other changes noticed in the following pages are principally in points of detail, leaving the principles of law unaffected.

1 Paper Buildings, Temple, June 20, 1884.
CONTENTS.

PART I.

THE COMMON AND EARLY STATUTE LAW RELATING TO LAND.

CHAPTER I.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Introductory. Elements of the Law of Land before the reign of Henry II.</th>
<th>PAGE</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

SECTION I.

Anglo-Saxon Customary Law.

| § 1. Effect of the Teutonic Settlement | 1 |
| § 2. Folkland and Bookland             | 11 |
| § 3. Relation of Lord and Man          | 20 |
| § 4. Summary of Anglo-Saxon Customary Law | 25 |

SECTION II.

Effects of the Norman Conquest

| § 1. Relation of the King to the Land | 28 |
| § 2. Development of the idea of Tenure | 37 |
| § 3. Development of the Manorial System | 43 |

SECTION III.

Original Documents.

| § 1. Anglo-Saxon Grants of Bookland | 55 |
| Gift of Lands to a Church by Ustitial of Kent. A.D. 709 or 715 | 55 |
| Gift by Oswald, Bishop of Worcester. A.D. 963 | 57 |
| Charter of Cnut. A.D. 1033 | 58 |
| § 2. A Feoffment in Fee of the time of Henry II | 59 |

CHAPTER II.

State of the Law relating to Land in the Reign of Henry II

Extracts from Glanvill.

| § 1. Customary and Positive Law | 61 |
| § 2. Supremacy of Curia Regis in matters relating to the Freethold | 67 |
| § 3. Relation of Lord and Free Tenant | 72 |
| § 4. Feudal Incidents | 75 |
| (1) Reliefs, Aids | 75 |
| (2) Guardianship in Chivalry or Knight Service | 78 |
| (3) Guardianship in Socage | 81 |
| (4) Marriage of Female Tenants | 81 |
| § 5. Escheat and Forfeiture | 82 |
| § 6. Descent of an Estate of Inheritance | 84 |
| § 7. Alienation | 86 |
| § 8. A Fine of Lands | 90 |
| § 9. Modes of recovering Seisin of Lands, Assizes of Mort d'Ancestor and of Novel Dissisin | 92 |
CONTENTS

CHAPTER III

State of the Law from the End of the Reign of Henry II to the End of the Reign of Henry III

PREVIOUS PAGE

SECTIONS I

Extracts from Statutes.

- Magna Carta

- § 1. Reliefs

- § 2. Guardian and Ward

- § 3. Marriage

- § 4. Widow’s Dowery

- § 5. Scutage and Aids

- § 6. Forfeiture

- § 7. Alienation

- § 8. Mortmain

- § 9. Rights of the Lord of a Manor over the Waste. Statute of Merton

PAGE 101

SECTIONS II

Extracts from Bracton.

- § 10. Growth of Judiciary Law

- § 11. Tenures

- § 12. A Common-Law Conveyance of a Freehold Estate:
  - (1) A Charter of Feoffment
  - (2) Livery of Seisin

- § 13. Villenagium. Non-free Tenure

- § 14. Alienation

- § 15. Differences of Freehold Estates in respect of their Duration. Estates of Freehold and Estates less than Freehold. Conditional Gifts

- § 16. Tenancy by the Curtesy of England

- § 17. Terms of Years

- § 18. Servitudes. (Easements and Profits). (1) In General

  (2) Rights of Common

PAGE 116

CHAPTER IV

Legislation of Edward I

- § 1. A Manor in the time of Edward I

- Extenta Maneri, 4 Edward I, Stat. 1

- § 2. Alienation in Mortmain

- Statutum de Viris Religionis, 7 Edward I, Stat. 2, c. 13

- Statute of Westminster II, 13 Edward I, c. 32

- § 3. Estates Tail

- Statute of Westminster II, 13 Edward I, c. 1. De Donis Conditionibus

- § 4. Rights of Common Appurtenant

- Statute of Westminster II, 13 Edward I, c. 46

- § 5. Alienation. The Statute of ‘Quia Emptores’

- Statute of Westminster III, 18 Edward I, cc. 1, 2, 3. Statutum Domini Regis de terris vendendis et emendis

PAGE 127
CONTENTS.

CHAPTER V.

Completion of the Common or Earlier Law

§ 1. Leasehold Interests

Extract from Britton. Terms of Years

Extract from Littleton’s Tenures. Tenant for Term of Years

§ 2. Estates Tail

Translation of the Pleadings in Talbarum’s Case

§ 3. Interests in Futuro. Reversions and Remainders

(1) Reversions

(2) Remainders (Vested and Contingent)

Extract from Brooke’s Abridgment, Dene and Remainder

Extract from Littleton’s Tenures

§ 4. Joint Tenants, Tenants in Common, Coparceners

Extract from Littleton’s Tenures (Sir E. Coke’s Translation)

§ 5. Creditor’s Rights

(1) Remedies by Legal Process

(2) Mortgages

Extract from Littleton’s Tenures (Sir E. Coke’s Translation)

§ 6. Copyhold Tenure

Extract from Littleton’s Tenures (Sir E. Coke’s Translation)

APPENDIX TO PART I.

§ 1. Place of the Law of Real Property in the English System

Table I.

§ 2. Rights over Things Real classified in respect of their duration

Table II.

§ 3. Rights over Things Real classified in respect of the time of their enjoyment

Table III.

PART II.

THE MODERN LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

CHAPTER VI.

Origin and Early History of Uses or Equitable Interests in Land

1. 15 Richard II, c. 5

2. Extracts from Calendars of Proceedings in Chancery:

(1) Proceedings in Chancery in the Reign of Henry V. William Dodd v. John Browning and another

(2) William of Arundel, Esq. v. Sir Maurice Berkeley, Knight, and others

(3) Examination by the Bishop of Bath and Wells, Chancellor of England, of two persons to whom one Robert Crody had made a feoffment by parol, on his death-bed, in trust for his wife for life, with remainder to his daughter in tail

(4) Year Book, 4 Edward IV, 8. 9. Translation

(5) Year Book, 7 Edward IV, 14. 8. Translation

Year Book, 18 Edward IV, 11. 4. Translation
CONTENTS

CHAPTER VII

The Statute of Uses and its principal effects on Modern Conveyancing .......................... 300

- § 1. The Statute of Uses ............................................. 301
  27 Henry VIII, cap. 10. An Act concerning Uses and Wills. 303
- § 2. Effect of the Statute of Uses upon the power of dealing with the Legal Estate in Lands ............................................. 310
- § 3. Statute of Enrollments ............................................. 322
  27 Henry VIII, cap. 16. An Act concerning Enrollments of Bargains and Contracts of Lands and Tenements ............................................. 324
- § 4. Equitable Estates in Lands since the Statute of Uses ............................. 324
  Tyrrell's Case ................................................................... 330
  Girland v. Sharp ................................................................. 331
  Nevill v. Saunders ............................................................. 332

CHAPTER VIII

History of the Law of Wills of Land ........................................................................ 333

- (1) The Act of Wills, Wards, and Primer Seisins, whereby a man may devise two parts of his land. 32 Henry VIII, cap. 1 ............. 343
- (2) An Act for the Explanation of the Statute of Wills. 34 and 25 Henry VIII, cap. 5 ............................................................. 345
- (3) The Act for the Amendment of the Laws with respect to Wills. 7 William IV and 1 Victoria, cap. 26 ............................................. 346

CHAPTER IX

Abolition of Military Tenures ............................................................................ 349

- 12 Charles II, cap. 24. An Act for taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries, and Tenures in Capite, and by Knight's Service, and Purveyance, and for settling a Revenue upon His Majesty in lieu thereof ............................................. 352

CHAPTER X

Titles or Modes of acquisition of rights over Things Real ..................................... 357

- § 1. Title by Alienation .................................................................. 358
- § 2. Title by Succession ..................................................................... 375
- § 3. Miscellaneous Titles:
  (1) Escheat ............................................................................. 380
  (2) Loss and Acquisition by Lapse of Time .................................. 382
  (3) Compulsory Acquisition for Public Purposes ......................... 384
  (4) Acquisition under Inclosure Acts ...................................... 385
  (5) Compulsory Enfranchisement of Copyholds ......................... 386
  (6) Bankruptcy ......................................................................... 386

TABLE IV

................................................................. 387

Glossary

................................................................. 389

Index

................................................................. 395
PART I.

THE COMMON AND EARLY STATUTE LAW RELATING TO LAND.
CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY. ELEMENTS OF THE LAW OF LAND
BEFORE THE REIGN OF HENRY II.

The English law of land is of a mixed origin. The customs of the early Teutonic invaders, the inevitable effect of conquest and settlement of the land on a large scale, the gradual and what may be called the natural growth of feudal ideas, the effect of the Norman Conquest in developing these ideas into a system of law and in importing doctrines unknown before, the subsequent influence of the Roman and Canon law, all these are elements of which account must be taken in attempting to trace the growth of the law of land.

By the time of the reign of Henry II a definite system of law may be said to have arisen. This will be the subject of the next chapter. In the present an attempt will be made to take some account of the elements out of which the system of the law of land ultimately grew.

SECTION I.

ANGLO-SAXON CUSTOMARY LAW.

§ 1. Effect of the Teutonic Settlement.

The earliest element in the English law of land is certainly the Teutonic. Whatever traces may have existed of the laws
CHAP. I. of Rome at the time of the earliest Teutonic invasion, no vestige of them is to be found in the evidence we possess of the Anglo-Saxon customary law. The conquerors, unlike the tribes which overran Italy, Gaul, and Spain, retained the customs, the religion, and the language which they brought with them uninfluenced by the people whom they dispossessed. Moreover, those customs were of pure home-growth, without any admixture of the element of Roman law or civilisation. ‘Our forefathers,’ says Mr. Freeman, ‘came from lands where the Roman eagle had never been seen, or had been seen only during the momentary incursions of Drusus and Germanicus.’

The mode in which Teutonic settlement was effected is matter of conjecture only. There is however no doubt that it was the work of successive bodies of invaders during parts of the fifth and sixth centuries. But the process was not merely that of invasion by bodies of armed men, it was the migration of whole communities bringing with them the organisation and the customs which had regulated their life at home.

It is probable that when the invaders had dispossessed the natives of a large tract of land the allotment of the territory was effected in a regular mode, so as to reproduce the main features of land-tenure with which they had been familiar in their Continental homes. The Britons seem to have been so completely exterminated or driven westward, or those that

1 Mr. Finlason, in the preface to his edition of Reeve's History of English Law, thinks that the Roman law lingered on and was adopted by the conquerors. There appears, however, to be no sufficient evidence in favour of this view. Probably some few doctrines and practices of Roman law were introduced by the clergy after the adoption of Christianity, especially that of disposition by will (compare Tacitus, Germania, c. 29, ‘nullum testamentum’), but the large infusion of Roman law which exists in our own was mainly of much later introduction. See Stubbs' Constitutional History, i. p. 62.

2 Freeman's Norman Conquest i. 20; and compare Stubbs' Const. Hist. i. p. 11, Green's Making of England, p. 140.

3 ‘The invaders come in families, and kindreds, and in the full organisation of their tribes: the three ranks of men, the noble, the freeman, and the last: even the slaves are not left behind.’ Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 64. See Green's Making of England, p. 154.
remained reduced to so abject a state of servitude, that no appreciable influence was exercised by the native element upon Teutonic customs.

There is no direct evidence as to the mode in which the conquered portions of the territory were colonised by invaders. Materials for conjectures more or less probable are afforded by the records of similar proceedings in the case of other Teutonic and Scandinavian conquests¹, and by the nomenclature and legal and other phenomena which are found existing in later times. It must be borne in mind that the invaders, though still retaining many habits derived from ancient Teutonic customs, had attained to a certain degree of political organisation at the time of the invasion. The body of invaders is a regular army led by a chief, and divided into ‘hundreds’ of warriors, who are united by a bond of real or supposed kinship, and probably come from neighbouring homes².

There can be little doubt that regard was paid to this division of the host into hundreds in the distribution of the conquered territory. It is impossible to trace the exact links of connection between the hundreds of warriors who constituted the sub-divisions of the Teutonic army and the territorial hundred of later times; there can however be no question that the two are connected, and the most plausible conjecture seems to be that a definite area of territory, though probably not of uniform size, was in the original process of colonisation assigned to each hundred, that the name then gradually ceased to have a personal, and began to acquire a territorial signification, that it was adopted as the most important division for fiscal and judicial purposes, and that, as the whole country became colonised and brought under a uniform system of organisation, the boundaries of isolated hundreds would be extended till they touched each other, and thus the present division of the county into hundreds, or districts of the same kind but bearing different names, was effected.

¹ Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. 72.
² ‘Centeni ex singulis pagis sunt, idque ipsum inter suas vocantur, et quod primo numerus fuit, jam nomen et honor est.’ Tacitus, Germania, c. 6. This too was the number of the assessors of the princeps for judicial purposes. ‘Eliguntur in hisdem concilis et principes qui jura per pagos vicisque reddunt. Centeni singulis ex plebe comites, consilium simul et auctoritas adsunt.’ Ib. c. 12.

But though the settlement of the hundred bore an important part, as will be seen later, in the development of one element of the manorial system, there are other features of the Teutonic settlement which appear to have a still more important bearing on the history of the law of land.

The inquiry is here complicated by the necessity of giving some answer, without sufficient materials, to the questions—What were the main features of primitive land-tenure amongst the forefathers of the English? How and in what forms had these features developed at the time of the migration? and how far did they survive, and in what ways were they affected by the process of conquest and colonisation?

The earliest form of systematic land-tenure, the settlement of the 'village community,' has of late received so much learned investigation that its main features may almost beyond a doubt be regarded as having been recovered. When the Teutonic nations ceased to be purely nomad, a state from which some tribes appear to have been only just emerging in Caesar's time, the first definite settlement or appropriation of land would be by a group of households forming a family, or a small cluster of families, the bond of union being real or supposed kinship, and occupying a definite area of land.

The characteristics of this settlement appear to have been

1 See Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. 96, 97.
2 I refer especially to the writings of Von Maurer, and to Professor Nasse's short treatise 'On the Agricultural Community of the Middle Ages,' translated by Col. Ouvry (Macmillan, 1871), p. 28. See also Sir H. Maine's Village Communities, Lects. iii and v; and Mr. Morier's essay in the volume on Land Tenure published by the Cobden Club (Macmillan, 1879); and compare the description of the 'Mark System' in Stubbs' Const. Hist. i. pp. 49-52; and Green's Making of England, pp. 180-187.
3 Caesar de Bell. Gall. vi. 22.
as follows. Each community occupied a territory or mark, which was divided into three, or rather four, portions. There was, first, the township in which the houses and their surroundings are appropriated and held by the heads of families in individual proprietorship. Here probably we have the earliest instance of separate or individual property. As a whole the district would not be regarded as individual property at all. The notion that the ownership of the soil of the whole district is vested in the king or some great lord is almost certainly of later growth. But from the earliest times of permanent settlements the house which the freeman had built and the curtilage which he had enclosed must have been regarded as his own property, held in dependence on no other man or body of men. We shall find that in later times house property in towns is regarded as having a more absolute and independent character than property in agricultural or common land.

Secondly, there was the arable portion, or the district of cultivated land, in which separate plots were held, for a time at all events, in severalty, by individual members of the community, subject to certain customary regulations as to common cultivation and enjoyment. The most usual of these were that the arable land should be divided into three fields (campi), one of which should lie fallow every third year, and that the whole community should have rights of common pasturage on the fallow portion, and on the stubbles of the cropped fields at certain periods between harvest and seed-time. It appears probable that these three fields were not always on the same spot; fresh land would be broken up, and land which had been cultivated would go out of cultivation and be used only for pasturage. It would necessarily follow that the portions of land allotted to individuals were not

1 'Quam quiesque domus spatio circumdata.' Tacitus, Germania, c. 16.
2 As to tenure in burgage, see below, p. 48.
3 Nasse, p. 10; and see Tacitus, Germania, c. 26, and Stubbe, Const. Hist. i. p. 19.
held by them as permanent or separate property; they were beneficially enjoyed for a time and then returned to the common stock, the proprietor receiving other allotments in their place.
The meadow-land was dealt with in a similar way. It was open for common pasturage during the interval between hay-harvest and the new growth of the grass. It was then fenced off in separate parcels, which were for the time appropriated to the various heads of families.
Lastly, there was the common land or wastes not appropriated to individuals at all, on which the whole community had rights of pasturage, wood-cutting, or the like. The various rights over the common territory were regulated by the village assembly, consisting of all the freemen.
Traces of this mark system became indelibly fixed in our law. The house with its surroundings was regarded as the absolute property of the possessor. Hence probably in towns and larger villages arose the conception of tenure in burgage, the form of tenure which in feudal times came the nearest to absolute property in land. The practice of re-allotting from time to time portions of the arable or meadow land is occasionally noticed in later times\(^1\). The right of pasturage on the arable land or ‘common field,’ the right that is which each cultivator had at a particular time of year to put his cattle on the plots of his neighbours as well as his own, and for that purpose to have the fences removed, appears in our law under the name of common of shack\(^2\). The right of \(^1\) See Coke upon Littleton, 4 a. Pratt v. Graeme, 15 East’s Reports, 235.

\(^2\) See Corbet’s case, Coke’s Reports, part vii. 5 a. ‘In the county of Norfolk there is a special manner of common called ‘shack,’ which is to be taken in arable land, after harvest until the land be sowed again, &c.; and it began in ancient time in this manner: the fields of arable land in this country consist of the lands of many and divers several persons, lying internized in many and several small parcels, so that it is not possible that any, without trespass to the others, can feed their cattle in their own land, and therefore every one doth put in their cattle to feed promiscue in the open field.” Often the right is of a more extensive character than is here described, and is in practice enjoyed, though as will appear hereafter often without legal justification, by the neighbouring inhabitants.
common pasturage during some months of the year on CHAP. I. meadow-lands, which for the greater part of the spring and summer are appropriated for hay to individuals, is still more common. Lands subject to these rights are often known as Lammas lands, Lammas-day (August 13, O.S.) being the time at which the common rights begin\(^1\). Lastly, the rights of common enjoyment over the waste became curtailed, and transformed into rights which at some forgotten period the lord of the manor is supposed to have granted to his tenants or to neighbouring freeholders.

On the whole, we may fairly conjecture that the hundreds of warriors did, when they had subdued a portion of territory, divide it among families who formed villages or townships, bearing strong traces of the Teutonic mark system. Probably to each of these townships a definite district would be allotted, consisting of land already occupied by or adapted for dwelling-houses and their appendages, of arable land, of pasture land, and of wastes, marshes, and woods. The share which was allotted to each member (whether uniform in size or not is doubtful) was called by various names, all bearing the common interpretation of land sufficient for the support of a family\(^2\). There can be little question that the main features of the mark system were reproduced, so far as regards mode of enjoyment of the arable, pasture, and waste land within the district.

From the first the township or village community must have been regarded as forming a part of the larger aggregate, the hundred. Probably the village assembly or mark-moot regulated only the affairs of the village, and had not any judicial functions. It was probably concerned mainly with matters relating to the common cultivation of the arable land, the mode of using the pasture, meadow, and waste land, the

\(^1\) The name is also sometimes applied to arable land over which rights of common exist, such as are mentioned in the last note.

\(^2\) Hide, terra familiae, familia, mansa, mansus, cassata, etc. See Stubbe, Const. Hist. i. p. 21.
CHAP. I. admission of new settlers in the district, the raising contributions for common purposes, and such matters, exclusively relating to the interest of the township. These functions devolved in later times partly on the manorial court, partly on the vestry of the parish; the former being the assembly of landholding inhabitants considered as tenants of a lord, the latter of landholding inhabitants considered as members of a parish, the township being considered as an ecclesiastical division. Each township contributed a certain number of representatives to the court of the hundred, which probably, amongst its other functions, exercised civil and criminal jurisdiction in the district.

It may well have been the case that, besides the bodies of invading warriors, there were numerous isolated migrations of small bodies, who, without attempting conquest on a large scale, settled down on vacant lands and reproduced the features of the village communities of their former homes. Such small communities, if they existed, must in process of time have become merged in the larger aggregates as the country became more extensively settled, or have fallen under the power of some great lord, the territory occupied by them becoming part of his domain.

One of the most interesting questions, if there were materials for anything more than conjectures more or less plausible, is, how far were districts of conquered land at or soon after the primitive settlement assigned to the king or chief

---
1 Even at the present day the functions of the manorial courts and of the vestry are not always kept distinct. It is very common to find that an idea still prevails that the parishioners assembled in vestry have the power of regulating rights over the waste lands within the parish. Acts of control are frequently exercised over such lands by parish officers. As will be pointed out later, there is at the present day, except under special circumstances, no legal justification for this notion; it doubtless descends from a time before the lawyers had precisely defined the relative rights of the lord of the manor and of commons having common appendant, appurtenant, or in gross. See the observations of Lord Chancellor Hatherley in Warrick v. Queen's College, Oxford; Law Reports, 6 Chancery Appeals, p. 723; and see below, ch. III. § 18.

2 Stubbs, Const. Hist. 1. p. 102.
or his principal followers to be held by them in severalty, and, if such assignments were made, what was the relation of the allottees of such districts to the dwellers on them?

In primitive times, when a body of invaders has succeeded in conquering a portion of territory and settles down upon the land which it has won, that territory is looked upon as the property of the community at large, rather than of the individual chief, king, or leader. At the same time the presence of the chief—the leader whose personal or hereditary eminence inspires his followers with the belief in his kinship with the gods—is a necessary element in the process of conquest and settlement. But he is not at first regarded as owner of the land. No doubt the chief would as part of his functions regulate the original distribution of the land; but this he would do as head or leader of the community, not as having appropriated the soil to himself and granted it out to his followers. What the community had won would be regarded as belonging to the community at large.

Still it seems probable that a large district of land was from the first allotted to the successful leader of the conquering host, who seems to have at once been recognised as king. But it must be borne in mind that the title and office of king did not at first involve any necessary relation to the land.

The idea of separate or individual property in land had, as above seen, been developed before the migration, to what extent it is difficult to say; but it is not improbable that the conception of separate ownership, which was probably at first confined to the house and its enclosure, had before the Conquest attached to the larger domains allotted to or appropriated by the leader of a body of victorious colonists. It seems therefore probable that, as happened in other cases about the same

1 The distribution seems to have taken place by lot under the superintendence of the chief. The portion allotted to the various companions of the chief is called ‘ēðel,’ ‘kid,’ or ‘aled.’ See Kemble’s Saxons in England, i. 90, and Stubbs’ Constitutional History, i. p. 71.
2 Stubbs, Const. Hist, i. p. 66.
period, from the first settlement a large domain would be reserved for or allotted to the king. Whether or not that domain would include lands already allotted to townships, so that the townships would be regarded as existing on the land of the king, and under a peculiar obligation to render to him dues in rent, in money, or kind, is doubtful. It would seem more probable that the allotment should in the first instance have been from land not appropriated to or occupied by townships, but comprising a large district inhabited only by scattered settlers or the natives who remained. Thus probably originated the notion of the royal domain; the lands would be tilled for the king’s benefit by Teutonic or native slaves, some of the more distant portions might be loaned or lent by him to tenants.

It is impossible to say whether in the original allotment similar districts were assigned to the immediate followers of the king, the leaders of the second rank, or whether by the various means which will be mentioned later they acquired the ownership of such districts at periods subsequent to the Teutonic conquest. The large amount of land available for division, the probability that the ownership of a domain by a great man was not altogether unfamiliar to the Teutonic settlers from the date of the earliest migration, seem to give ground for a conjecture that in many cases such districts were allotted to the king’s immediate followers at the time of the original partition of the soil. If this were the case, the nature of their ownership and their relation to the dwellers on the soil would present the same features as characterised the district allotted to the king.

On the whole, therefore, we may conjecture that as a general rule the different bodies of settlers divided the land into townships or districts bearing the main features of the Teutonic mark, that probably a large district was allotted to the leader as his domain, and perhaps smaller districts to the king’s immediate followers.

1 Compare Gibbon, iv. 187 (Milman’s ed.).
FOLKLAND AND BOOKLAND.

Over and above the land thus settled would be a large amount of surplus land, increased perpetually, as the boundaries of the occupied territory are enlarged, by further conquests and dispossessions of the native inhabitants.

Whatever land a man could call his own, whether it was the house and enclosure of the free townsman or the domain of the king or great man, was his 'ethel' or 'alod.' The land not appropriated to individuals or communities is public land, folkland, or land of the people. It is not the subject of individual rights of ownership at all; perhaps individuals or communities may have temporary rights of possession or enjoyment on portions of it, but it belongs to no man; it is subject to the control of the community as a whole; it can be dealt with only by the king, with the consent of the great men, who in conjunction with the great ecclesiastics, after the introduction of Christianity, form the Witenagemot, or Assembly of the Wise.

§ 2. Folkland and Bookland.

Perhaps the most accurate description which can be given of folkland is that it is the surplus or unappropriated land within the boundaries of the community. The waste land of the village is closely analogous to it, though it does not appear to have been called by that name. Dealing however with the time when the work of conquest and colonisation had so far advanced that an organised community was settled upon a territory, with fixed boundaries, at the head of which was the king and his witenagemot or witan, the folkland is the surplus land which is not owned by individuals or within the limits of the township, but is at the disposal of the king and his witan.

When the kingdom has attained its full development it appears that the folkland might be dealt with in one of three ways. Either grants might be made of it by the king and his witan, or in other words the community might grant it to individuals to be held in severality as individual property, losing its character as public land; or it might continue to retain its character as folkland, and temporary rights of enjoyment or possession might be permitted on definite terms to individuals; or there might exist no separate individual rights over it at all, and the land might remain uncultivated and used by the members of the community for common pasturage, for cutting turf, wood, and the like. Each of these modes of dealing with the folkland must be shortly commented on.

(1) From very early times it was common to grant away portions of the public land to religious bodies or to individuals, so that the land ceased to be public land and became what we should style corporate or private property. The grants were effected by the king as the chief of the community, by and with the assent of his witan, by means usually of a ‘book’ or charter. Land thus granted was said to be ‘booked’ to the grantee, and was called bocland or bookland. Thus bookland as opposed to folkland comes to mean land owned by private persons or churches; who or whose predecessors are, or at least are supposed to have been, grantees of the community. The practice seems, after the introduction of Christianity, to have prevailed chiefly in favour of religious houses, and in this way the great ecclesiastical corporations acquired their property. Frequent gifts

---

1 Kemble’s Saxons in England, i. 301.
2 Whether the land was actually considered as transferred by the book, as by a modern deed under 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106, or whether any additional ceremony resembling livery of seisin was requisite (see below, chap. III. § 13 (2)), is a point on which I have not been able to find authority. The analogy of the practice of other nations would seem to show that something like delivery of a piece of turf, a bough, &c., would be considered essential. Kemble, Cod. Dipl. i. v, seems to think that this was so in early times, that the practice then went out, and the book and taking possession under it was sufficient, till the practice was revived by the Normans under the form of livery of seisin. See too Palgrave’s Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth, ii. cxxxvii; and Essays in Anglo-Saxon Law (Boston 1876) p. 110.
were also made to individuals, chiefly the king’s thegns or ministers 1.

In process of time the conception of bookland comes to be nearly if not quite coextensive with that of alodial land. The term ‘alodial’ did not however have any necessary reference to the mode in which the ownership of land had been conferred; it simply meant land held in absolute ownership, not in dependence upon any other body or person in whom the proprietary rights were supposed to reside, or to whom the possessor of the land was bound to render service 2. It would thus properly apply to the land which in the original settlement had been allotted to individuals, while bookland was primarily applicable to land the title to which rested on a formal grant. Before long, however, the words appear to have been used synonymously to express land held in absolute ownership, the subject of free disposition inter vivos or by will 3. Later, when the conception of ‘tenure’ had become more general, the meaning of ‘alodium’ seems to be land which would descend to the heir 4.

As a general rule, when a grant of folkland was made to an individual to hold as bookland, it is expressed in the gift itself that he is to hold the land free from all burdens, that he is to be under no obligation to render anything in the shape of money payment or services of any kind to the grantor of the land, with the exception of the threefold service, the trinoda necessitas, to which all lands were subject. This consisted of the duty of rendering military service (experdicio), and of repairing bridges and fortresses (pontis arcivae constructio). These were duties imposed on all landholders, distinct from the feudal services of later times, but tending more and more to become duties attaching to the possession of the land owed

1 And hence the expression tain- or thegn-land. This seems to mean not a particular species of tenure, but land which was as a fact held or owned by a king’s thegn.
2 See Freeman, i. 90.
3 See Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 76, n. 3.
4 See below, p. 26.
Chap. I.

It is also generally expressed in the charter that the grantee of the land is to be entitled to grant the land away to whomsoever he pleases in his lifetime, or to leave it by his last will, and that, if not disposed of, it is to descend to his representatives. These powers however seem to have depended upon the form of the gift as expressed in the charter; the power of alienation might be restricted so that the land could not be granted away from the kindred, or the descent of the land might be confined to lineal descendants, or to heirs male or female. In these respects it was a principle of Anglo-Saxon customary law that the nature and extent of the rights of the grantee depended upon the form of the gift.

The king himself might be the grantee under one of these grants. In that case he held the land thus granted like any other private individual; it was his private property which he could dispose of as he pleased.

In the later grants it is very common to find words expressing that rights of jurisdiction are conveyed together with the land. These rights were extremely profitable, and

---

1 See Kemble's Cod. Dipl. i. iii, and Stubbs' Const. Hist. i. pp. 76, 190.
2 Or person to whom the land is granted. This termination is always used in a passive sense.
3 The capacity of selling the land is often mentioned in Domesday as a characteristic of absolute ownership. See Freeman, vol. iv. p. 733; and Allen on the Royal Prerogative, p. 145.
4 "The man who has bookland, and which his kindred left him, then ordain we that he must not give it from his "megburg" [kindred], if there be writing or witness that it was forbidden by those men who at first acquired it, and by those who gave it to him, that he should do so; and then let that be declared in the presence of the king and of the bishop before his kinsmen."—Laws of Alfred, cap. 41; Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 62, 4th ed.
5 See Kemble's Saxons in England, i. p. 308; Codex Diplomaticus, i. Introduction, pp. xxxii—xxxvi.
6 See a grant by Æthelwulf to himself, A.D. 847, Cod. Dipl. vol. ii. No. ccix.
7 This is commonly expressed by the words 'sae' and 'soc,' a jingle to which it is difficult to attach a precise meaning. It imports 'jurisdiction,' became an important source of revenue to the great lords of districts. The rights were regarded as taken away from the hundred court and vested in the grantee as the owner of a franchise or liberty or district exempt from the jurisdiction of the hundred. The machinery of the hundred court would however be preserved, except that the territorial court would be presided over by the great man or his representative. To this court all the dwellers within the district would have recourse and become suitors. Thus the great man of the district acquired the headship or presidency of the courts held within the district, and by a gradual change the village assembly or mark-moot passes into the court of the tenants of the lord, called in later times the court baron or customary court; while the court leet of later times probably represents the jurisdiction of which the hundred court was deprived by express grant.

(2) Besides grants of folkland to be held as bookland or as private property, it seems also to have been common to allow individuals temporary or possessory rights over folkland without altering its character as public land, the reversion (to use a later expression) still remaining in the community at large, or in the king as the representative of the community. It seems that it was not unusual for a relation resembling what would in later times be called a tenure to be created between the community or its chief and the person to whom rights of separate enjoyment over the folkland had been granted. There is evidence that in some cases various rents, dues, or services in money or kind had to be rendered for the enjoyment of rights over the folkland\textsuperscript{1}. Whole communities too might sometimes grow up on the folkland, and in such a case they would be from the first more dependent on the king or his grantee than the more primitive township. On the whole, however, we possess but little information as to the relations of the possessor of folkland to the king or the community, or as to the duties and services under which it was held. That such rights over folkland were sometimes made the subject of disposition by its individual possessors, but that this could only be carried out by the assistance of the king as the head of the community, appears from a curious document of the date A.D. 871–889\textsuperscript{2}, purporting to be a will of a certain Ælfred, in which, after disposing of his bookland, he requests the king to allow his son to succeed to the folkland which he himself holds, and if not, he leaves his son instead an equivalent out of his booklands. This shows that, in all probability, no individual rights enjoyed over folkland could be permanently alienated either \textit{inter vivos} or by will without the consent of the community or its chief.

1 See Stubbe, Const. Hist. i. pp. 106, 184.

Any person who had proprietary rights over land, whether he were only in the beneficial occupation of folkland, or were an owner of bookland, might in his turn grant to another the power of beneficial enjoyment of the land on such terms as might be agreed on between them. Such an interest was regarded as less than that enjoyed by the grantor himself. At the expiration of this smaller or shorter interest the land would revert to the grantor. Land thus granted or let was called laenland. This practice was especially common on \textsuperscript{1} See Kemble's Saxons in England, i. 294–298; Allen's Royal Prerogative, p. 134; Stubbs' Const. Hist. i. p. 76.

\textsuperscript{2} Cod. Dipl. ii. 120, No. ccxvii. Kemble (Saxons in England, i. p. 181, note 1) has collected several curious instances of requests by testators to the king that their wills might be allowed to stand. These wills must, one would think, in most cases relate to interests over the folkland. Bookland was generally or universally the subject of free disposition by will. The idea however that the power of disposition possessed by the grantee depended upon the form of the gift may perhaps account for these expressions.
ecclesiastical lands. We find instances of lands leased for two or three lives¹, or for other periods, with rents reserved in money, in kind, or in labour². The conception of the legal effect of ‘loans’ of lands would be that the property or dominion remained in the lessor or lender, the person having the ‘laen’ possessing only the usufructuary enjoyment to a greater or less extent according to the terms of the loan³. Thus if the latter incurred forfeiture for treason the rights of the lessor would not be affected⁴.

(3) Besides the folkland dealt with by grant and thus turned into bookland, and the public land which retained its character but was enjoyed by individuals, there remained a very large proportion of the land of the country lying waste and uncultivated, and used only for pasture of sheep and cattle, for feeding swine on the acorns and beechmast, or for supplying wood for building, repairs, and fuel. What proprietary rights were recognised over land of this character?

It was primarily regarded as the common stock from which grants might be made. Bede in the eighth century speaks of it as land which ought to be granted to ecclesiastics or to warriors, but instead of this proper use, ‘persons who have not the least claim to the monastic character have got so many of these spots into their power under the name of monasteries, that there is really now no place at all where the sons of nobles or veteran warriors can receive a grant⁵.’

When the country was brought under the government of a single king, this land seems to have been regarded as in an

¹ See specimen below, p. 57. Very commonly, however, the land was leased or lent for the life of the lessee. See specimens of these ‘conventiones’ in the Domesday of St. Paul’s. See below, p. 49.
² See as to laenland, Kemble’s Saxons in England, i. p. 510.
³ Cod. Dipl. i. lxxi.
⁴ See the case of Holmstan, Kemble’s Saxons in England, i. p. 317. It seems that the laen was in this country rather the precursor of the lease or leasehold than of the feudum or beneficium. In Germany, however, lehn = feudum, lehnrecht = feudalism, feudal system.
⁵ Epistola ad Eobirhtum Archiepiscopum, quoted in Kemble’s Saxons in England, i. p. 290.
CHAP. I. especial manner the property of the king, and is frequently spoken of as the king's folkland 1. Besides the grants of whole districts of this land to be held as bookland, we frequently find that rights of pasturage and other beneficial rights over it are granted away to individuals by the king in the usual form 2. There can be but little doubt that this unoccupied land came to be more and more regarded as the land of the king—terra regis 3. And hence grew in later times the conception that all the land was originally vested in the crown 4, that the king is prima facie the owner of all unoccupied land, even of the shore of the sea below high-water-mark. Sometimes the king would have exclusive rights over this unoccupied land, more commonly his rights would exist side by side with those of the inhabitants of the neighbouring villages 5. In early times these rights were probably regarded as rights of common on public lands which the king would share with others. Later the property was looked on as vested in the king, the commoners having rights in alieno solo.

As the smaller kingdoms become subject to or are merged in the greater, and the king becomes the king of the whole nation, the notion that the public or unoccupied land is the royal domain appears to be more strongly developed. The actual ownership of the public land and a sort of suzerainty over the rest of the land of the country comes to be vested in the king. He always speaks of the folkland by some such expression as terra juris mei, pars telluris meae. And through-

---

1 See Nase, 'On the Agricultural Community of the Middle Ages,' p. 28.
2 Thus Offa of Mercia in 772 grants to Æthelnoth, Abbot of SS. Peter and Paul, lands 'cum campis et silvis vel omnibus ad se pertinentibus bonis et ad ascendum porcos et pecora et jumenta in silva regali aeternaliter perdona, et unius caprae licentiam in silva quae vocatur Senling ubi meae vadunt.' Cod. Dipl. cxix.
3 See Stubbs, Const. Hist. i, 193.
4 'Tout fut en lay et vient de luy al commencement.' (Year Book, 24 Edw. III, 65, quoted in Blackstone, ii. p. 51, note.)
5 See Cod. Dipl. cclxxxvi, where there is a grant of a villa 'et communio nem maris quae ad illam villam antiquitas cum recto pertinebat;' and cclxxxvii; and see Kemble's Introduction to Cod. Dipl. i. p. xi.
out the country the claim of the king to certain dues, services, and proprietary rights, varying in different localities, is recognised.¹

What has been said of the king applies also, though in a less degree, to the great men of the nation, the king's thegns and the great ecclesiastical persons and bodies. Whether or not any districts were assigned to powerful individuals at the time of the original allotment of the territory, there can be no doubt that large districts soon become the property or domains of great men. This may have been due partly to conquest and colonisation by small detached bodies under a leader; or in particular communities leading men may in some cases have acquired by gift or purchase such domains. But after the new communities had attained to complete organisation, the principal mode of creating such properties was doubtless the grant of portions of the folkland by the process above described. Thus there arose a class of territorial magnates, partly the successors of the princes whose petty lordships or principalities came to be held in subordination to and dependence on the king of the whole country, partly bishops, churches, or great men who had acquired, by grant or otherwise, large tracts of land. These territorial magnates are supreme over the land, both occupied and unoccupied, within their districts. But they are also subordinate to the king of the nation; when therefore grants are made by such persons, it is worthy of observation that they are almost always expressed to be with the assent of the king. Thus the king is acknowledged as a sort of over-lord, whose ¹ We hear frequently of royal rights of pasturage, of rights of free quarter for royal messengers, of having the royal huntsmen, horses, dogs, and hawks kept. (See Cod. Dipl. i. liv; Kemble's Saxons in England, i. 293.) Compare Crant's law, lxx: 'I command all my reeves that they justly provide for me out of my own property, and maintain me therewith, and that no man need give me anything as farm aid (foarme-fultume), unless he himself be willing.' (Thorpe, Ancient Laws and Institutes, p. 413, ed. 1840.) It appears from this passage that the king had certain rights in the various villae which were looked after by reeves or bailiffs.

§ 3. Relation of Lord and Man.

Such were the fundamental notions of proprietary rights over land which prevailed amongst our Teutonic forefathers. But there is another element in Teutonic custom, at first wholly unconnected with the holding or ownership of land, which came in process of time to form an important element in the complex structure called the law of real property. This is the relation of lord and man, which gradually developed into the relation of lord and tenant. The primitive form of this relation is found in the description of the mutual connexion of princeps and comes described by Tacitus. It was in its earliest form the association of a chief and his chosen band of followers in warfare. This was characterised by the most absolute devotion of the comes to the princeps. The chief was regarded as the fountain of honour and the giver of gifts to those who were bound by oath to follow him. In our own early records this relation of princeps and comes has developed into the relation of lord and man. It has become a tie of mutual service, responsibility, and protection in every relation of life, and is regarded as one of the principal bases of social order. So far was this idea carried, that the fact of rendering even menial service to a person of exalted rank was thought to reflect nobility on the person rendering it. But this relation is not at first necessarily connected with the holding of land; the relation is that of princeps and comes, of king and his thegns, of lord and man, not of lord and tenant.

1 See the grant of Oswald Bishop of Worcester, given below, p. 57.

When however a territory was occupied by a conquering tribe, probably, as has been said above, the most fertile parts of the land would be appropriated by the chief and his followers. The principal share would fall to the chief, who, as the head of the community, would regulate the management and distribution of the whole. The lands occupied by the comites would not probably in any other sense have been considered to have been granted to them by the chief. No relation or duty, as between the chief and the comites, would arise from the fact of the grant of the lands. That relation already existed independently of the grant of the lands. No doubt the comites occupying the lands would be in a sense bound to military service, not in the first instance as landholders, but by reason

---

1 'And we have ordained, respecting those lordless men of whom no law can be got, that the kindred be commanded that they domicile him to folk-right, and find him a lord in the folk-mote; and if they then will not or cannot produce him at the term, then be he thenceforth a "flyma" [runaway], and let him slay him for a thief who can come at him; and whoever after that shall harbour him, let him pay according to his "wer," or by it clear himself.'—Laws of Athelstan, Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 66; and see Freeman's Norman Conquest, vol. i. p. 96.

2 See the chapter in Kemble's Saxons in England, vol. i, on 'the Noble by Service.' The thegn grows out of the comes; he is a servant, but a servant ennobled by the dignity of him whose attendant he is. Freeman, i. p. 92.
CHAPTER I.

of their personal relation to the chief. When the idea of a nation as an organised political community has been developed, it is probable that the obligation of military service for the defence of the community attaches in every case to the holding of land by the freeman. This seems to have been universal from the time of the earliest charters. There was no escape for the landholder from the trinoda necessitas. This, it must be observed, is different from tenure by knight service, though it must be taken into account amongst the causes which led to the growth of military tenures.

In the records of the Anglo-Saxon period it seems that a gradual development can be traced, marking the stages in the progress of the relation of princeps and comes towards that of lord and tenant. At first we have the purely Teutonic institution of the comitatus. The king has around him comites or geœiths, who form his counsellors, his body-guard, and personal attendants. The existence of the folkland enables him from time to time to make grants of portions of territory to them.
Gradually the geœith or companion ceases to be heard of, and the thegn or minister takes his place. It seems to be difficult at first to distinguish between the two. The duties of the thegn seem to be more distinctly warlike than those of the geœith, and the position of the thegn seems to have come more and more to imply possession of a large district of land. Thus in the relation of the thegn to the king we see the germs of the later relation of the king to the tenant in capite holding of him by military service.

The relation of the king to the thegn is reproduced on a smaller scale by the relation between the great men and their dependants. A great thegn might have lesser thegns standing in a relation to him closely analogous to that in which he stood to the king.

Thus from the earliest times there would exist in the various bodies of original settlers a princeps or lord, supposed to be sprung from a lineage higher than that of common humanity.

---

2 Ib. p. 158.
In many cases there arose in this way a sort of hereditary chieftainship. Amongst his other functions, the chief, prince, or king is supreme over the land. He has himself the most extensive rights of enjoyment over it, and he has the power of granting similar rights to others. Thus he passes into the lord of the district—of the land itself, as well as of the men who dwell thereon. When his district or petty kingdom becomes merged in and subject to a larger kingdom, he in his turn becomes subordinate to the superior prince. There is not yet any formal surrender and regrant of the land; but the supremacy of the superior prince is acknowledged, as in other matters, so in making grants of portions of the district of which the inferior is lord. There is as yet no distinct conception of the relation of superior lord, mesne lord, and tenant; but there is a relation which by an easy transition may assume those feudal characteristics.

The development of these lords of districts no doubt was brought about in other ways than that above indicated. The grants of enormous tracts of land by the king and his witan must frequently have comprised whole village communities, and had the effect of imposing a lord or superior landowner upon the district, whose yoke would in all probability be harder than the more distant suzerainty of the king. And no doubt in communities consisting of free and equal cultivators of the soil, sometimes in troublous times a chief arose who became their leader in war and their first magistrate in peace.

1 When the land granted was already occupied by possessors having a durable interest which the customary law would protect, the grant must have been of the nature of a grant of a lordship or of seignorial rights. Compare the grant of Leofric (Earl of Mercia, eleventh century), Cod. Dipl. dcccxxxix, where half the town of Coventry and many villages are granted to the Church of the Blessed Virgin at Coventry, 'cum saca et soca et telone et theno et omnibus consuetudinibus sicut eas a rege Eadwardo melius unquam tenui.' The right of jurisdiction and the profits arising from the district courts were the most important of these seignorial rights. See Stubbs' Const. Hist. i. pp. 182-187, and above, p. 14, note 7.

2 See Sir H. Maine's account (Village Communities, p. 143) of the probable mode in which the manor grew out of the mark.
This appearance of a chief in a small community may also have been aided by the tendency which has been observed in these small communities, for particular families to possess or acquire an ascendency. The chief was often a member of a family enjoying a species of hereditary pre-eminence. These chiefs doubtless became in process of time lords of districts of land.

Thus there can be no question that towards the end of the Anglo-Saxon period it became common for large districts of land to be held by lords or great men, king's thegns or others; and, as has been seen, extensive tracts were also held by religious corporations.

Of such districts a large portion was retained by the lord in his own hands. This portion was called terra dominica, terrarum dominicata, or domain lands. On this portion stood the principal house, the mansio or manor-house as it was called in later times. The lands were cultivated for the benefit of the lord by serfs, or perhaps often by freemen bound to render agricultural services. On the remainder of the occupied land the rights of the lord were rather in the nature of a seignory or lordship. He had no right to the actual possession or enjoyment of the land itself, but only to the

---

1 See Freeman's Norman Conquest, i. p. 38; Sir H. Maine's Village Communities, p. 145.

2 See Hale's Introduction to the Domesday of St. Paul's, p. xxx (Publications of Camden Society). And see the document entitled Rectitudines Singularum Personarum in the Ancient Laws and Institutes, p. 432. In the Domesday of St. Paul's we find that prædial services were due from three classes of persons, called villani, cotaríi, bordaríi. In the Rectitudines (placed by Thorpe next after the laws of Chno) we find præ-dial services due from villani, cotestle, geburi. The villani are serfs attached to the hides or land on which they live; the cotaríi and bordaríi are identical with the cotestle and geburi, and are cottagers with still smaller holding than the villani, and bound to lighter services. See Nasse, pp. 36-42.
Opposed to these classes bound to prædial service we find in the Rectitudines the 'Tsai léx,' 'Thegn law,' thus described;—'Tsai léx est ut sit dignus rectitudine testamenti sui et ut its faciat pro terra sua scilicet expeditionem, buhrbotam et brigbotam.' The whole document is interesting, as an indication of a stage in the history of tenure by knight-service, tenure in socage, and copyholds.
relations or dues to be paid or rendered by the persons in occupation of the soil. His rights over the waste or unoccupied land have already been spoken of.

The principal of these territorial magnates was the king. Besides his position as supreme lord of all the land in the kingdom, he was also the largest landowner. He filled the former position as chief of the nation, the latter as having acquired by the ordinary modes of acquisition a larger area of land than any other great man in the kingdom. It cannot however be supposed that these two capacities were kept entirely distinct. Traces can be discovered of a growing tendency before the Conquest for the folkland to become merged in the terra regis. After the Conquest the merger is complete, the folkland is heard of no more, and the king becomes the supreme landowner, the lord paramount of all the land, whose rights differ from those of any other lord not so much in kind as in degree 1.

Thus in the period preceding the Norman Conquest the growth of various conceptions can be traced in the customary law of land out of which the remarkable structure called the Law of Real Property was ultimately developed. There are present the elements of the idea of tenure, or of the rights and duties which constitute the relation of a landholder to his lord. This is found in the relation of lord and man which in some cases has developed into the relation of lord and tenant. But the creation of a tenure is not as yet regarded as the universal consequence of a grant of land. It is however probable

1 See Freeman’s Norman Conquest, i. p. 102; ii. pp. 52, 53; iv. p. 24; Allen on the Royal Prerogative, p. 150; Stubbs’ Const. Hist. i. p. 143.
2 On the difference between customary law and positive law properly so called, see below, Chap. II. Though there is apparently a large mass of written Anglo-Saxon law, it will be found to throw but little light on the law of land. Where it deals with this subject, it refers to and presupposes the existence of customary law. See on the character of this written law, Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 60.
that even the free alodial landowners in many cases became the vassals or tenants of the king or great lord, by ‘commend- ing’ themselves to him, acknowledging him as their lord, and receiving in return his protection. One evidence of the growth of the conception of tenure is to be found in the changed sense of the word ‘alodium’ as used in Domesday. It is sometimes there applied to hereditary and alienable land, which nevertheless is held of a superior lord. Other expressions in Domesday seem to indicate a transitional period between absolute independence and feudal tenancy. Thus it is common to say of the holder of land cum ea ire potuit quo voluit; that is, that he was at liberty to commend himself or become the man, vassal, or tenant of any lord he pleased. On the whole, the evidence seems to point to the conclusion that the early relation of princeps and comes had tended more and more to be connected with the holding of land; that the king was regarded by his thegns as the lord from whom they might look for grants of land, sometimes in the shape of large districts booked to them, to be held alodial; sometimes in the shape of beneficial possessory rights over the public land, for which dues and services would be payable, and which could not be permanently alienated without the king’s consent. Whether the land was free or burdened, every free landowner was

1 Liber homines commendati’ is a very common expression in Domesday. See Sir H. Ellis, General Introduction to Domesday, i. p. 64.
2 Thus it is common in Domesday Book to meet with such expressions as ‘ipse tenuit in alodio de Rege Edwardo.’ See Allen on the Royal Prerogative, p. 196; Freeman’s Norman Conquest, iv. p. 38, notes; Sir H. Ellis, General Introduction to Domesday, i. p. 55.
3 Hallam’s Middle Ages, ii. p. 66 (eighth edition).
4 See especially the instances given by Kemble of the consent of the king being required for testamentary alienation; above, p. 16, n. 2. Sometimes we find instances of a person simply being allowed, in the first instance, beneficial or possessory rights over the land, which afterwards becomes his independent alodial property. Thus land held, in the first instance, as læsland, is found in some cases to be converted into absolute property, the landlord, to use the language of the later law, releasing his reversion to the tenant. ‘Now there are three hides of this land which Archbishop Oswald booketh to Eadric his thane, even as he before held them as læsland.’—Kemble, Saxons, p. 313.
subject to the burden of military service; which was deemed not an incident of tenure, but a duty to the State.

The relation subsisting between the king and his thegns was reproduced on a smaller scale in the case of the great lords who had acquired or inherited districts of land. The dwellers within the district were tending to become their tenants. This was the case especially with the classes of serfs and freemen bound to agricultural service. Tenure by knight-service is unknown till after the Norman Conquest; tenure by suit of court, rent, or agricultural services—what in later times would be called tenure in socage or in villenage—certainly in substance existed before. Doubtless too the lord before the Conquest had in many cases acquired what in later times was the great characteristic of a manor. The free assembly of the village had become the lord's court. To this court was usually attached, either by virtue of the express grant under which the lands were held, or by long usage, the jurisdiction which in the Anglo-Saxon system properly belonged to the court of the hundred. And just as the unoccupied land of the community had come to be regarded, first as the king's folkland, and secondly as the terra regis, so had the waste, unoccupied, or common land of the village community come to be regarded as the lord's waste, over which the dwellers within the district exercised certain customary rights.

Besides the elements of the conception of tenure, Anglo-Saxon customary law contributed certain other principles of permanent influence, modified more or less by the changes consequent upon the Conquest, to the conception of the rights of private property in land.

Of these the principal are (1) the conception of the duration of an interest in lands. The Anglo-Saxons conceived the idea of an estate of inheritance in lands, an interest which would descend to successors in infinitum. They also had the idea of inheritances limited to particular descendants, as for instance to the males of the family. Such peculiar characteristics could be impressed upon the interest in lands by the form of the original gift. Estates for life were also known; these seem to have been especially common in the conventiones or leases under which lands were held by firmarii upon ecclesiastical property.

1 See above, p. 8.

(2) Another important point is the freedom of alienation both inter vivos and by will, which was characteristic of bookland. Probably where there was no express charter the right of alienation was ordinarily limited by the claims of the family. The history of the right of alienation inter vivos will be traced later: the right of alienation by will ceases altogether with the introduction of Norman law, except in some particular localities and boroughs, and is not revived till a new class of proprietary rights arises, which supersedes, in great measure, the old law.

(3) Upon the death of the landowner, his land, as a rule, subject to many important modifications by local custom, descended to all the sons equally, as contrasted with the rule of primogeniture, which was of Norman introduction. The history of the law on this point will be noticed in reference to a passage in Glanvill.

SECTION II.

EFFECTS OF THE NORMAN CONQUEST.

Such are the main outlines of the customary law of land prevailing among the Anglo-Saxons. It was of home-growth, and but little influenced by the legal ideas which had developed on the Continent since the decline of the Roman Empire. No doubt, in its framework and language, an

---

1 See many specimens of these leases for lives in the Domesday of St. Paul's, p. 123, etc. It was very common for ecclesiastical bodies to lease their territory to firmarii, the lessee standing in the place and having all the rights of the lord, rendering to the lesors fixed rents in kind or money.

Leases of particular portions of land within the district were also (probably) common.

2 Below, Chap. II. § 6.
EFFECTS OF THE NORMAN CONQUEST.

Anglo-Saxon charter resembled those in use elsewhere; but this arises not so much from the identity of legal conceptions as from the fact that these instruments were everywhere drawn up by the clergy, who shared in the common training, ideas, and phraseology of the Universal Church.¹

We have seen that the early Teutonic customs had by the time of the Conquest developed into what may be called, for want of a better name, a kind of feudalism. There were, at all events, two of the principal elements of feudalism—the relation of king and thegn, of lord and man, and the development of great territorial lordships, of which by far the most numerous were those enjoyed by the king. We cannot doubt that these two elements of feudalism were becoming blended; that the thegn was gradually passing into the tenant in capite², the man of the lord of a district into his tenant. But these names, together with the whole apparatus of modern legal terminology, had not yet arisen.

Another type of feudalism had by the time of the Conquest been developed on the Continent. On the Continent the primitive Teutonic customs had been affected, not only, as in England, by the natural consequences of conquest and settlement of fresh lands, but by the fact that the inhabitants of the lands thus conquered were living in a state of culture and civilisation far superior to that of their conquerors. Hence it was that the barbarian tribes which overran Italy, Gaul, and Spain, adopted the religion and laws of the conquered nations, modified to some extent by old barbarian usages. For the present purpose it is only important to notice the effect of this medley of barbarian usage and Roman law³ upon the attributes of property in land.

² A tenant-in-chief, that is, a tenant holding immediately of the king.
³ See Maine's Ancient Law, p. 564, and for an elaborate account of the causes which led to feudal tenure, Palgrave's Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth, i. p. 492, etc., and ii. p. ccxiv.
upon frontier lands upon condition of their rendering service when called upon in the defence of the frontiers. Probably the conception of the tenure under which such soldiers held their lands was borrowed to some extent from the attributes of the interest in lands called emphyteusis. Though the emphyteuta (the person having the right) had an indefinite power of enjoyment and alienation, emphyteusis was nevertheless regarded as a jus in re aliena, as a right distinct in kind from the dominium or property in the land, which was considered to be retained by the dominus, notwithstanding the extensive character of the rights of the emphyteuta. The latter rights were enjoyed upon conditions created at their origin, the payment of a rent (pensio, canon) being the most usual. If the condition was broken the full beneficial right reverted to the dominus, and the emphyteusis ceased.

The barbarian settlers upon Roman territory seem to have been brought under the influence of these legal ideas, and a curious blending of them with the old Teutonic customs becomes apparent. Whether we regard the Teutonic conquests on the Continent, according to the older theory, to have been accomplished by principes each with their separate comitatus, or, according to the view of the latest authorities, to have been 'the work of the nations moving in entire order', as subjects of a king, the appropriation and re-allotment of conquered lands by the chief or king becomes the prominent feature of the new societies. Amongst the gifts which the chief or king makes to his followers or subjects, gifts of land become the most important. They receive the special name of beneficia. As in the case of emphyteusis, the subject of the gift is not regarded as the absolute property of the beneficiary. His enjoyment is conditional on his performing certain services; and these probably derive their character partly from the Teutonic notion of his relation to his princeps, partly from the Roman obligation of defensive service. The oath by which the comes became bound to the princeps passes into the act of doing homage to the lord and swearing fealty to him in return for the grant of lands. The land is held upon condition of rendering military service. If the condition is broken the land is forfeited to the donor. Thus arises the conception that from the gift new rights and duties flow, a tenure or relation of lord and tenant is created thereby.

---

1 See summary of the authorities on this subject in Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 251, note 2.

These beneficia in process of time receive the name of feuda, which in its earliest acceptation means land which has been granted to be held of the donor, as opposed to alodial land.

It was a further step in the direction of feudalism to turn alodial holders of lands into holders of these beneficia or feuda. The lot of the conquered is always hard, and doubtless the alodial holder of land was glad to retain the enjoyment of a portion of his property on such terms as the conqueror chose to impose. The usual conditions were that the old free proprietor should become the ‘man’ of the conqueror, and should be bound to military service. Moreover, in those troubled times it often became a necessity for the poor alodial holder to enter into the train of retainers of a powerful lord in order to obtain protection: hence the practice of ‘commendation,’ of becoming the man or vassal of the lord, receiving in return

---

1 The word feudum is not found earlier than the close of the ninth century. Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 254, note 1. Its etymology has given rise to much controversy. Blackstone (ii. p. 445) thinks that it comes from two words in ‘the Northern languages, fœc signifying conditional stipend or reward, and odh, proprietas.’ Sir F. Palgrave believes it to be simply a colloquial abbreviation of emphyteusis (Rise of English Commonwealth, ii. p. cxxxii). Dies, however (Etymologisches Wörterbuch der Romanischen Sprachen), sub voce fœdus, shows that feudum is a Latin recollection of a word sprung from an old Teutonic root—Lombardian fius, Old High German fehus (wiel), Gothic fiedus, signifying cattle, or, generally, property; cattle being probably amongst the earliest subjects of property (see sub voce fœdus in Bosworth’s Anglo-Saxon Dictionary, and compare pecus, pecunia). Hence feudum, the d being added for euphony (compare femum in Domesday). Hence fief, fœc, fœdus, fœdament, etc.; and see Litttré, Dictionnaire de la Langue Française, sub voce fief. Sir H. Maine (Early History of Institutions, p. 157, etc.) describes the creation amongst the ancient Irish of a relation analogous to that of lord and vassal by the gift of stock by the chief, and its voluntary or forced acceptance by the tribesman.
the protection without which the preservation of life and property was impossible. An element in this process was the surrendering of the alodial lands, to be received back under the condition of rendering military or other service.

Such is in outline the probable account of the origin of the great characteristic of feudalism—military tenure of lands; known in our law by the name of tenure in knight-service, or in chivalry.

It was created by the tie of homage, the solemn act by which the tenant acknowledged his lord as him of whom he held his land, and to whom he was bound to render service; and from which, on the other hand, arose the duty on the part of the lord of protecting his tenant. The lord himself (where the lord was other than the highest) was in the same way the vassal or tenant of some other over-lord. But between the superior or chief lord and the tenant who held his lands of the vassal of the superior lord there was no immediate relation of service and protection or otherwise.

The system of military tenure of lands prevailed in Normandy before the Conquest of England, and it seems probable that the customary law of that country had elaborated with some minuteness and technicality the various rights and duties of lord and tenant by military service. They were his tenants bound to render to him military service whom William summoned when the news of the death of Edward was brought to him. The fact that by the terms of their tenure they were not bound to service beyond the sea caused him some difficulty. The rapid introduction in the century succeeding the Conquest of a strict definition of the mutual duties of lord and tenant, and of a highly technical legal phraseology, leads to the conclusion that these must have been to some extent imported at the Conquest; and that amongst the Normans must have been found, what the Anglo-Saxons certainly did not possess, a class, if not of trained lawyers, at all events of men habituated to abstract reflection on the prevailing customs, able to express them in legal phraseology, and to draw conclusions from the established principles of customary law.

1 See Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 249.
FEUDALISM.

From the mixture of Anglo-Saxon customary law with the Norman, the blending process beginning under the influence of the strong rule of the Conqueror, and forced on with rapid strides by the vast territorial confiscations which followed the Conquest, arose the Common Law relating to land. It must not be supposed that a new system of rules of law was consciously introduced and forced upon the conquered race; the new structure was owing to the political and social changes wrought by the great Conquest, to the process of settlement and reorganisation under a powerful ruler, who would brook no imperium in imperio, and to the convergence of two distinct streams of customary law.

The effect of the Norman Conquest upon the land law of England is best dealt with by considering the change wrought, first, in the relation of the king to all the land in the country; secondly, in the development of the idea of tenure, or the rights and duties constituting the relation of lord and tenant; and thirdly, in the growth of the manorial system.

§ 1. Relation of the King to the Land.

By the conquest or acquisition of England William succeeded to all the rights of the Anglo-Saxon kings. The rights over the land which they had became his. The great possessions held by them in their private capacity devolved upon William, and no distinction any longer existed between the king’s ownership of land in his private capacity and his suzerainty over the folkland as chief of the nation. All

1 Blackstone and other writers regard the ‘feudal system’ as a set of rules consciously devised to serve certain purposes, and voluntarily or compulsorily adopted by the various communities in which they prevailed. See Blackstone, book ii. ch. 4, ‘Of the Feudal System.’ But laws, especially in early times, ‘are not made, but grow.’

2 See above, p. 25.
CHAP. I. alike became terra regis. Besides the land to which he thus became entitled as the legitimate successor of the Anglo-Saxon kings, all the land held by those who had resisted him was, by the customary law of both England and Normandy, forfeited to the king.

The enormous amount of land thus forfeited, the vast grants made to William's Norman followers, the practice of making grants of land to the same person in different parts of the country so as to prevent the creation of a too powerful territorial aristocracy, are matters dwelt on in all histories of the period. Besides the actual dispossess, a vast quantity of the land of the kingdom was deemed to have been forfeited or surrendered to the king, and regranted by him.¹

That the powerful followers of the Conqueror to whom he granted districts of land should become his tenants, bound to render military service to him, was in accordance with Norman customs, and also necessary for the consolidation of the Conqueror's power. It seems probable that in every case these grants were made in return for the tenant doing homage to William and binding himself to military service. The free landowners who received back their lands as tenants of the king would also be bound to service, military or other. The military service would probably at first be measured by the existing custom of the equipment of one fully-armed man for every five hides of land.² In the course of the century succeeding the Conquest some lands become exempt from, others subject to, military service. The landowner bound to military service becomes the tenant in chivalry (per militiam); the miles becomes the knight; and where land is held by military service every portion amounting to twenty pounds in annual value constitutes a ‘knight’s fee,' for which the service of a knight fully armed and equipped must be rendered.

¹ As to the repurchasing of the conquered land by the English, see Freeman, vol. iv. p. 35; v. pp. 20, 26; and Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 259. According to Mr. Freeman, vol. v. pp. 24, 787-758, it was necessary at the time of Domesday to a good title to any land except that held by ecclesiastical bodies that the tenant should be able to adduce evidence of a grant, regrant, or confirmation by William.

² "Si rex mittebat aliehui exercitum, de quinque hids tantum unus miles ibat, et ad ejus victum vel stipendium de unaquaque hida dabantur et iiii. solidi ad duas menses. Hos vero denarios regi non mittebantur sed militibus dabantur. Si quis in expeditionem summonitus non ibat, totam terram suam erga regem forisfaciebat. Quod si quis remanendi habens aliquum pro semittere promitteret, et tamen qui mittendus erat remaneret, pro i. solidis quietus erat dominus ejus."—Domesday, Customs of Berkshire, Stubbs' Select Charters, p. 91.

Thus the notion of military tenure, at all events as between the king and the great barons, rapidly took root after the Conquest. But there is another element in the conception of the relation of the king to the land of the country which must not be lost sight of. It has been seen that before the Conquest the whole land was subject to the burden of the trinoda necessitas. There can be little doubt that after the Conquest this burden came to be regarded as a service due to the king quite irrespective of the fact whether the landholder bound to render it was the king’s tenant or not. This probably is the explanation of the famous oath taken by ‘all landholders’ at the council of Sarum in 1086. And the form of homage which was adopted after the Conquest to create the feudal tie between a mesne lord and his tenant always contained a saving of the allegiance due to the king.

A powerful ruler like William, who had had abundant experience of the tendency of continental feudalism to make the vassal a formidable rival to the king, was not likely to throw away the advantage of the existence of a principle forming so important an aid to the central authority as the Anglo-Saxon

---

1 Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 264.
2 ‘There came to him his witan and the landholders that were throughout England, and they became his men, and all submitted themselves to him and were his men, and swore fealty to him, and that they would defend him against all other men.’ Saxon Chronicle, A.D. 1086; Stubbs, p. 81; quoted in Blackstone, ii. p. 49. Compare Laws of William i, cap. 2; ‘Statuimus etiam ut omnis liber homo foedere et sacramento affirmet, quod infra et extra Anglia Willelmo regi fideles esse voluit, terras et honorem illius omni fidelitate cum eo servare, et ante eum contra inimicos defendere.’ (Select Charters, p. 83.) See Freeman, Norman Conq., v. 64, 366, 382.
3 See the form of homage given below, Chap. II. § 3.
CHAP. I. trinoda necessitas. No doubt, in times when the central authority was weakened, the barons succeeded for a time, especially during the reign of Stephen, in shaking off their allegiance to the crown and summoning their tenants to serve them in their private wars. In the long run, however, the strong and vigorous centralisation effected by William, and organised by Henry II, resulted in firmly establishing the principle, that where the land was held of a mesne lord by military service, propter patriae tuitionem, the service was regarded as due not to the mesne lord, but to the king. This is the distinguishing characteristic between English and Continental feudalism, and was fraught with consequences of the most vital import to the growth of the English constitution. The only exception to this principle seems to have been when the lord himself personally attended the king. In that case he might summon his military tenants to attend with him, or exact a pecuniary equivalent in lieu of service, called scutage or escuage.

1 The following passage from the Ordonnances of St. Lewis, c. 49, A.D. 1276, gives a graphic picture of the relation of king or supreme lord, mesne lord and tenant, under the French feudalism. The text modernised is as follows:—Si un seigneur dit à son hôte lige: 'venez avec moi; car je veux faire la guerre à mon seigneur, qui m'a refusé justice en sa cour,' le vassal doit lui répondre: 'Sire j'ira vers mon seigneur m'informer s'il est ainsi que vous dites.' Alors il viendra trouver le chef seigneur, et lui dira: 'Sire, mon seigneur m'a dit que vous lui avez refusé justice en votre cour; je me présente devant vous pour savoir la vérité, car je suis sommé de l'accompagner pour vous faire la guerre.' Et si le chef seigneur répond que son intention n'est pas de lui faire justice en sa cour, le vassal se joindra à son seigneur, qui sera tenu de l'équiper à ses dépens. Mais s'il refusait de marcher avec lui, il en perdrait de droit son fief. Si, an contraire, le chef seigneur lui répond: 'Je rendrai volontiers justice à votre seigneur en ma cour,' le vassal doit venir trouver son seigneur, et lui dire: 'Sire, mon chef seigneur m'a dit, qu'il vous rendra volontiers justice en sa cour.' S'il lui répond qu'il ne veut plus se soumettre à son jugement et qu'il lui enjoigne de se rendre à la sommation qu'il lui a faite, alors le vassal pourra le refuser, de droit, sans crainte de perdre son fief, ni autre chose. (Isambert, Rec. d'Anc. Lois, ii. p. 416.) See below, Chap. III. § 11.

2 As to scutage, see below, Chap. III. § 5.
§ 2. Development of the idea of Tenure.

A principal result of the Norman Conquest upon the customary law of land seems to have been the development of the idea of tenure, the more precise definition of the mutual rights and duties of lord and tenant, and, as a necessary consequence, the introduction of a technical phraseology. This result was not brought about by any positive enactment. It was due to the introduction of Norman customs and ideas, and their combination with Anglo-Saxon customs and ideas.

Thus was produced what is called the feudal system, or the feudal mode of holding lands. We find that wherever there is a duty imposed on the possessor of land, whether of a military or other character, the tendency after the Conquest was to regard the duty as the service by which the land was held of the king or lord. Thus the Anglo-Saxon custom that every five hides should furnish a fully-armed man would be transformed into a tenure of so much land by the duty or service of providing a miles. The duty of attendance on the lord’s court became the tenure by suit and service, and the duty of performing agricultural service on the lord’s domain became the service by which the land of the poor freeholder or villein was held.

Domesday bears abundant traces of the growth of the idea of tenure, though we still hear of the men (homineri) of a lord rather than of his tenants. The land is everywhere spoken of as having been held of King Edward or some other lord. The word feudum or fenna is used to designate the land which is held as a benefice and not alodially\(^1\). The personal relation of lord and man is closely connected with, and generally, though not always, merged in the relation of lord and tenant\(^2\). The various modes in which land was held by

---

\(^1\) See above, p. 31, and the Index to Domesday.

\(^2\) Compare the following passages:—'Non fuit de feundo sed tantum fuit homo suus.' (Kelham’s Domesday Illustrated, p. 212.) ‘Homo (effectus est) antecessoris sed terram suam sibi non dedit.’ (Ib. 233.) ‘Milites habebant sub se quattuor Ian liberi et ipsi erant.’ (Ib. 272.)
different classes of persons before the Conquest were now tending to become different species of tenure, and gradually acquiring definite technical names. Thus land held by religious houses, which before the Conquest was always free from all temporal service except the trivola necessitas, is now said to be held by the tenure called libera eleemosyna (free alms or frankalmoign)\(^1\). It is however still regarded as free from all temporal dues, and the religious corporation is only bound to spiritual service. The services due to the king, which if rendered to one of less exalted rank would have been considered degrading to a freeman, were still in the time of Domesday rendered by the taini regis\(^2\), but were no doubt becoming connected with the holding of the land, and passing into the exalted tenure of magnum servitium, or grand serjeanty\(^3\). Hence it was that lands held by this tenure can only be held of the king. But most important of all is tenure per militiam, in chivalry or by knight-service. Here again the evidence afforded by Domesday seems to show that this species of tenure had not yet definitely taken its place in the legal classification of rights of property, but was gradually becoming recognised\(^4\). No doubt military tenure first prevailed between the king and his immediate tenants—those who had actually received new grants of land, or their old

\(^{1}\) See Ellis, General Introduction to Domesday, i. p. 248. The word is however used in Domesday in a more general sense, and is sometimes applied to the case of restoration of lands to a layman which had been held by his father or himself. See Freeman, Norman Conq., v. pp. 31, 364-366.

\(^{2}\) Ellis, General Introduction to Domesday, i. p. 45.

\(^{3}\) This name does not appear in Domesday. No doubt at that time the accurate distinction between different species of tenure had not arisen. Probably these distinctions were not accurately drawn till the great impulse given to the development of the Common Law by the action of the tribunals organised by Henry the Second.

\(^{4}\) We find however in two passages the expression (l. 10 b, and i. 32) ‘servitium unius militis’ applied to a new tenure; this became the regular technical term for the military service due for a knight’s fee. ‘T.R.E. (tempore regis Edwardi) valdebat xx. sol. et post 1 sol. modo 111 lib. et servitium unius militis’ (Ellis, General Introduction, i. 261.) Tenants holding of the king are sometimes spoken of as ‘barones regis.’ According to Sir H. Ellis,
i. p. 58, ‘miles’ has not acquired the technical sense of ‘knight.’
lands regranted to them. By the Anglo-Saxon law the public duty was imposed on such tenants of rendering military service for the defence of the country. Continental feudal notions would transform this public duty into the obligation of rendering military service to the king as lord of the tenants' land. But his position as king as well as lord was never wholly lost sight of. If a mesne lord, that is a lord who was himself a tenant of the king or of some superior lord, made a grant of land to be held of himself by military services, though the land was of course held of the mesne lord, the military service, as has been seen, was regarded as due not to the immediate lord but to the king. There is much that is obscure in the history of the growth of military tenure. There are some recorded instances soon after the Conquest of exemptions from the general obligation of military service being obtained in favour of some lands in consideration of other lands being bound by an obligation to furnish a certain number of militiam. It seems probable that the general extension of the practice of exempting some lands from military service and burdening others led to the distinction between military and non-military tenure which exists in its complete form by the beginning of the reign of Henry II.

Besides the duty of military service which constituted the essential characteristic of tenure in chivalry, various incidental rights and duties came to be attached to the relation of lord and tenant per militiam, some of which became the most important attributes of that relation. The first in order of time was that of relief, or the dues which the heir of the tenant was bound to render to his lord on being admitted tenant and rendering homage. This was confounded with the custom of rendering heriots on the death of the man or vassal which

---

1 See Bracton, fol. 35, given in Chap. III. § 11.
2 See Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. 264.
3 Mr. Freeman attributes the development and organisation of the system of feudal burdens to the 'malignant genius' of Randolph Flamard, minister of William Rufus. Norman Conq., v. 377, etc.
prevailed before the Conquest. The origin however of the practice of rendering heriots and of paying reliefs was different. The heriot probably originated in the practice of returning to the princeps the horse or the armour with which he had furnished the comes: it was of purely Teutonic origin. The relief originated with the practice of regarding lands as benefices to be held of the grantor. The admission of the heir as tenant in his ancestor's place was by the feudal theory a favour to be bought with a price, but which could not, if the proper steps were taken, be withheld by the lord. It was thus entirely a result of the conception of tenure.

The aid for marrying the eldest daughter of the lord is recorded as having been taken for the daughter of Henry I on her marriage with the Emperor. It appears however to have been levied as a tax on all land, not exclusively from the tenants in chivalry. These auxilia or aids were apparently not at first strictly defined, limits were probably imposed on them by customs which were observed or exceeded according to the capacity or power of the lord. Finally, they were restricted to a reasonable aid for ransoming the lord if he were taken captive, for making the eldest son a knight, and for marrying once the eldest daughter.

---

1 See the Laws of Cnut (71, 72) as to the amount of heriots due upon the death of an earl, a king's thegn, etc.; Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 74. From this law was borrowed the provision of William I as to reliefs: 'De relief a cunte ki al rei afort—viii cheuuls enfrenex e encelez (les iiiii) e iiiii hauberes e iiiii haumes e iiiii escez e iiiii lances e iiiii espees. Les autres ii cheleurs e ii palefres a freins et a cheuestres.' (Thorpe's Ancient Laws and Institutes, p. 474.) Similar provisions follow as to the relief to be paid by barons, vassals, and villeins. It is probably from the existence of this law of Cnut that the idea has arisen that heriots are exclusively of Danish origin.

2 See Kemble's Saxons in England, i. p. 178.

3 See further as to reliefs, below, ch. II. § 4 (1).

4 'Anno igitur sequenti data est filia regis imperatoris, ut breviter dicam, sicut decuit; Rex ipsaque cepit de unaquaque hida Angliae tres solidos.'—Hunc. Huntingd., Hist. lib. vii; Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 98.

5 See Magna Carta (John), cc. 12 and 15; below, ch. II. § 4 (1), and III.
The incidents of the greatest importance are those of wardship and marriage. These became rights of the greatest value to the lord, and most burdensome to the tenant. They are frequently spoken of as if they constituted the essence of tenure. Pure feudalism had but a short life in England. These incidents of tenure, the only justification of which was to be found in their aiding towards the completeness of the military tie between lord and tenant, soon lost every rational basis. It appears from the charter of Henry I, that the widow or some other near relation was to be allowed by their lord to be the guardian of the children. It will be seen that by the time of Glanvill the lord had acquired the right of assuming the guardianship of the person of the minor and of his lands, restoring them to him on his coming of age without accounting for the mesne profits. Further, the heir on coming of age was obliged to purchase the delivery of the lands (called livery or onusterlernaia) by payment of a fine of half a year’s profits of the land.

Some traces of the right of the lord to consent to the marriage of the daughter or sister of a tenant appear in the time of Domesday. In the time of Henry I, the lord simply has the right to prevent the daughter of his tenant being given in marriage to his enemy. The absolute right of the lord to § 5; Blackstone, ii. p. 64; and the Statute ‘Confirmatio Cartarum,’ 25 Edw. I.

1 ‘Si vero uxor cum liberis remanserit, dotem quidem et maritimationem habebit, dum corpus suum legitime servaverit, et eum non dabo nisi secundum valle suum. Et terrae et liberorum custos sive uxor sive alius propinquorum qui justius esse debeat. Et praecipio quod barones mei similiter se continerent erga filios et filias vel uxores hominum suorum.’—Charter of Henry I, c. 4; Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 101.

2 See below, Chap. IV. § 3 (2).

3 See Freeman, Norman Conq., v. 374, and compare the following entry: ‘Hanc terram tenuit Sirof de episcopo tempore Regis Edwardi, quo mortuo dedit episcopus filiam ejus cum hae terra cuidam suo militi, qui et matrem pasceret, et episcopo inde serviret.’ 1. fol. 173; and see below, Chap. II. § 4 (4); Chap. III. § 3.

4 ‘Si quis baronum vel aliorum hominum meorum filiam suam nuprum tradere voluerit sive sororem sive nepulum sive cognatum, necum indi lequantur; sed neque ego aliquid de suo pro hac licentia accepiam, neque
the disposal of the daughter of his tenant in marriage is recognized by Glanvill in the strongest terms, but it was not till the reign of Henry III that, by an iniquitous construction of a clause in Magna Carta, the lords extended their claim to the marriage of the sons of the tenant as well. The practice had by this time lost any shadow of justification on feudal grounds; originating simply with the grasping and illegal avarice of the great lords, it passed into a firmly established right of property.

One of the most valuable of the lord's rights was that of escheat, or the right of having the lands of the tenant on failure of his heirs. This right arises directly from the relation of lord and tenant. The tenant is conceived as having only an estate in the lands—an interest which though it may be capable of descending to heirs, in infinitum, was something short of absolute ownership. The lord has a possibility of the lands reverting to him, which the tenant cannot defeat.

Such are the main characteristics of the relation of lord and tenant in chivalry. It does not appear that in early times there was any difference, except in the leading feature of military service, between the rights of the king and of any mesne lord. The law as to aids, reliefs, marriage, and wardship was the same in both cases 1.

defendam ei quin eam det, excepto si eam vellet juggere inimico meo. Et si mortuo barone sive alio homine meo filia haeres remanerit, illam dabo consilio baronum meorum cum terra sua. Et si mortuo viro uxor ejus remanerit et sine liberis fuerit, dotem suam et maritacionem habebit, et eam non dabo marito nisi secundum velle suum.'—Charter of Liberties of Henry I, c. 3; Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 100. By the Ordinances of St. Lewis (ch. 63, Isambert, ii. p. 435) it appears that the right of the lord to a veto on marriage only existed in the case of the daughter of a tenant after the death of the father.

1 It appears that in later times special rights were claimed by the king, which were not claimable by mesne lords. Of these the principal were primogeniture and fines on alienation. Blackstone, ii. 66, 71.
§ 3. Development of the Manorial System.

It has been said that before the Conquest large districts of land were held by persons or corporations, the dwellers upon which, holding beneficially plots of land, usually of small size, were bound to render services, either in money, kind, or labour, to the lord or supreme landowner of the district. The probable connexion of these districts with the Teutonic mark has already been alluded to\(^1\). It is probable that the Conquest wrought but little immediate change in the relation of such persons to their lord. A Norman lord might be substituted for a Saxon, but the dues and services would substantially continue the same. We now find that these districts receive the name maneria, or manors\(^2\). In Domesday the words manusio, villa, manerium\(^3\) are synonymous. After the Conquest England is parcelled out into manors varying greatly in size; having as a rule fixed boundaries, often coinciding, as is still the case at the present day, with the boundaries of the parish. In some cases manors were diminished or added to, and new manors created\(^4\). Probably however there was no great addition after the Conquest to the number of manors\(^5\).

\(^1\) See above, pp. 8, 15, and comp. Freeman, Norman Conq., v. p. 460, etc.

\(^2\) The earliest appearance of the word is in the reign of Edward the Confessor, who was fond of introducing Norman language and customs. See Ellis, General Introduction to Domesday, p. 225.

\(^3\) Fleta (temp. Edward I), lib. vi, cap. 51, carefully distinguishes between manusio, villa, and manerium. Manusio consists of a single house or habitation (nulli vicina). Villa implies the existence of several habitations near each other. Each of these includes the tenements appertaining to or usually held with them. A manerium may consist of several villae, or of a single villa. But a villa cannot be more extensive than a manor, though it may comprise many parochiae. The word 'villa' was always used in writs to express the district where the lands in question in the action lay. See specimen below, Chap. II. § 2; Glanvill, lib. i. c. 6.

\(^4\) See Sir H. Ellis, General Introduction, p. 234, etc.

\(^5\) This is probably to be accounted for by the history of manors. A manor court owed its existence to long-established customs, the creation of a new court was probably regarded as beyond the power even of the crown. See Coke's Copyholder, xxxi: 'Hence it is that the king himself cannot create a perfect manor at the present day, for such things as receive their perfection by the continuance of time come not within the compass of the king's CHAP. I.  It has already been seen that, although the word 'manor' is of Norman introduction, substantially the relation of lord of a manor and his tenants existed before the Conquest. It is probable however that the idea of the legal relation between the lord and the smaller holders of land within the manor received more exact definition at the hands of Norman lawyers and justices. The lord is regarded in his relation to those below him as lord of the soil; in relation to the king or superior lord he is regarded as tenant. He stands in the same relation to the land of the district as the king fills in relation to the land of the whole country. Prima facie all rights over the land within the district which are not claimed by any individual are regarded as vested in the lord. The free holders of land become his tenants; he is not only lord of his men, but lord of the land, he is entitled to escheat on failure of the tenants' heirs, the rights of pasturage on the unoccupied lands enjoyed by the inhabitants of the district come to be regarded as jura in alieno solo—rights exercised over the land the ownership of which is vested in the lord. It must be remembered that the king is not only the supreme but the largest landowner in the country. He is lord of many manors in various districts. What is said therefore of the relation of tenants to their lords must be understood to apply also to the king when he is lord of the manor.

The holders of land within the manor may, for the purposes of legal history, be conveniently divided into the following classes. First, the tenants in knight-service or in chivalry, whose tenure must, if the views above stated be correct, have originated since the Conquest by grant, or commendation involving a regrant. The characteristics of this tenure have already been sufficiently detailed. Secondly, there are the prerogative.' As to the effect of the statute Quia Emptores (18 Edw. I), see below, Chap. IV. § 5.

It is significant that the word 'barones' in Domesday means not so much great territorial lords, as the justices of the king. The title was perpetuated in the Barons of the Exchequer until abolished for the future by the Judicature Act 1873. See Ellis, General Introduction, i. p. 44.
freenmen, bound to render service, other than military service, in money, produce, attendance at the lord's court, or labour; or rather, as they would be called after the Conquest, free tenants holding by such services. In Domesday we find these tenants spoken of as sochemanni, socmanni, or liber socmanni. The services to which they were bound seem to have been usually fixed or certain, and not capable of being exacted arbitrarily by the lord, such as the rendering of a certain amount of agricultural service, or paying a fixed rent in money or produce. Sometimes a free tenant would only be bound by the oath of fealty. It seems that in fact the line between the services rendered by free tenants and by the non-free was in many cases not clearly marked. They were doubtless regulated by local customs, and in some cases free men would be bound to render base services. The important thing was the status of the person rendering the services, not the service rendered. In process of time the nature of the services rendered, especially the characteristic of fixity or certainty,

---

1 The derivation of the word has given rise to much controversy. The generally accepted derivation is from 'soc,' an old word meaning a plough-share, the socage tenant being bound to agricultural service. But this was far from being universally the case; probably in early times it was the exception rather than the rule. There can be little question that the word is connected with *soces, socum, 'jurisdiction,' from the Anglo-Saxon *sceown, 'to seek.' The free landholders had probably by the time of the Conquest been brought nearly universally into the condition of persons owing suit or attendance at the court of some great man. Thus the sochemanni are probably the free suitors or attendants (sece, sequor) of the lord's court, who came in process of time to be regarded as tenants holding in socage, by the tenure of such suit or service. These tenants were usually brought under the obligation of rendering some fixed rent or service, and hence the later conception of the essential characteristic of socage tenure. See Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 273.

2 No doubt there was often a tendency to depress the free socmannus to a condition of servile; or at all events to require from him services unworthy of a free man. Hence in later times a distinction arose between free socage and villein socage; the latter being the tenure where the services, though certain, are such as are unworthy of a free man. A tenant holding by such services would in the time of Bracton (see below, Chap. III. § 13) not lose his status as a free man, but would hold by base tenure.
came to be regarded as the mark of a distinct species of freehold tenure called free socage.

Socage tenure is thus described by Littleton, who wrote in the reign of Edward IV⁠¹:—'Tenure in socage is where the tenant holdeth of his lord the tenancy by certain service for all manner of services, so that the service be not knight's service. As where a man holdeth his land of his lord by fealty and certain rent for all manner of services; or else where a man holdeth his land by homage, fealty and certain rent for all manner of services; or where a man holdeth his land by homage and fealty for all manner of services; for homage by itself maketh not knight's service.'

There can be little doubt that tenure in socage is the successor of the alodial proprietorship of early times. The changes in the direction of feudalism wrought by the Conquest affected the small free proprietors far less than the lords of great districts. Such of them as had not already become 'men' of some lord no doubt speedily entered into the condition of tenants; but they retained to a great extent, and in some localities almost entirely, their ancient customs.

The chief characteristics of socage tenure were, (1) on the death of tenant in socage the land, if 'antiquitus divisum,' descends to all the sons. This was the case in Glanvill's time⁡¹⁰, but under the influence of Norman lawyers the rule of primogeniture had become general in the next century, except in the case of the Kentish tenure of gavelkind⁠², and in other localities where special customs retained their hold.

¹ Littleton's Tenures, sect. 117. Sir E. Coke's translation.
² See below, Chap. II. § 6.
³ Before the Conquest, gafolound or gavelkind lands meant simply 'rent-paying' lands. Kemble, Introd. to Cod. Dipl. i. ixi. Gavelkind retained the characteristics of Anglo-Saxon law in a more perfect form than any other species of property in land. See Blackstone, ii. p. 84. Gavelkind lands (1) descended to all the sons equally, (2) were usually devisable by will, (3) did not escheat in case of attainder and execution for felony, (4) could be aliened by the tenant at the age of fifteen. The first of these characteristics still distinguishes gavelkind lands from other freeholds. How it was that these customs survived is a question of great difficulty; possibly
(2) The socage tenant is free from the obligation to military service by reason of tenure, nor is he always bound to render homage to his lord. The oath of fealty is universal, and sometimes constitutes his sole service. Whatever additional service may be due from him must be fixed and certain; the most usual was a fixed payment of rent.

(3) Some of the 'incidents' of tenure by knight-service had their counterpart in tenure in socage. The socage tenant was liable to aids and relief. The latter usually took the form of double rent for the first year after the tenant's death. Tenant in socage was however free from the oppressive incidents of feudal wardship and marriage; the guardian in socage was the next of kin who could not inherit, and was accountable at the termination of the wardship for the profits of the lands.

An important class of socage tenants were those who held lands of lords by this tenure in towns. By the time of Glanvill this class of tenants had obtained the distinctive name of burgage tenants. Besides the above-mentioned characteristics of socage tenure these burgage tenants retained in many cases local customs, especially as to the descent of lands, and as to devising them by will. One of the most remarkable of these is styled borough English, which is thus described by Littleton: 'Some boroughs have such a custom that if a man have issue many sons and dieth, the youngest son shall inherit all the tenements which were his father's within the same borough as heir unto his father by force of the custom the which is called borough English.' By the statute 12 Car. II. c. 24, the very fact that the hand of the Conqueror fell so heavily and at so early a date on the great men of the county operated to preserve the old customs amongst the poorer freeholders, whose insignificance was their best protection. (See Freeman, vol. iv. p. 34.)

1 See the Statute 28 Ed. I. stat. 1.
2 According to Littleton, s. 115, 'Every tenure which is not tenure in chivalry is a tenure in socage.' Bracton, on the other hand, distinguishes socage tenure from tenure by uncertain but non-military services. See lib. ii. cap. 16; below, Chap. III. § 11.
3 See Glanvill, lib. xii. cap. 3; below, Chap. II. § 2.
4 Littleton, sec. 165. For the history of this term, and an account of the tenures in chivalry, with all their peculiar incidents, were abolished and turned into 'free and common socage'.

When land was held of the king not by military service, but under the obligation to render some small thing 'belonging to war,' as, for instance, to 'yield to him yearly a bow, or a sword, or a dagger, or a knife, or a pair of gilt spurs, or an arrow or divers arrows,' this was called tenure by petit serjeancy.

Tenants of land holding by any one of the above-mentioned tenures—libera eleemosyna or frankalmogin, grand serjeanty, knight-service, socage, burgage, and petit serjeanty—were regarded as free holders having an estate or interest in lands worthy of a freeman, and involving no service derogatory to the status of freedom. Some time before the reign of Henry II, but apparently not so early as Domesday, the expression liberum tenementum was introduced to designate land held by a freeman by a free tenure. Thus freehold tenure is the sum of the rights and duties which constitute the relation of a free tenant to his lord. The mode of granting or conveying liberum tenementum was by the process called a leoffement (feoff- farti feoffamentum). The grantor is called the feoffor, the grantee the feoffee. Whether or not any formal mode of giving possession of the land granted by the delivery of a clod or some other similar act thereupon had been common among the Anglo-Saxons, is doubtful; but by the time of Henry II we find the two essential elements of a conveyance of a freehold interest in lands were (1) formal delivery of possession (technically called livery of seizin); (2) words accom-

---

1 See Chap. IX.
2 Littleton, sec. 159.
3 It is characteristic of the history of the growth of tenure that in Domesday (if the index is correct) we hear of different classes of tenants, but not of different species of tenure; of liberi homines, but not of liberum tenementum; of milites, but not of tenure per militia; of soecanni, but not of sociagium; of villani, but not of villenagium.
4 The proper meaning of the word 'seisin' is possession as of freehold; i.e. the possession which a freeholder has.
panying, indicating the nature and extent of the grantee's interest and the services to be rendered for it.

Besides the lands of the manor held by free or frehold tenants, the lord retained in his own hands the domain—terrae dominicales—portions of which were sometimes let to farmers, and portions cultivated by persons bound to render agricultural services for the benefit of the lord. The Domesday of St. Paul's leaves little doubt that there were frequently, especially upon ecclesiastical lands, farmers holding land under conventions or covenants, and rendering for it rent in kind or money. These would probably differ from the tenants in socage, for they would not be bound to the lord by homage or fealty; they would simply hold under the covenant or lease. Specimens of these leases are given in the Domesday of St. Paul's; they are usually for the life of the tenant. The convention was merely binding as between the tenant and the lord, it created no estate as between the tenant and third persons. In later times a lease of land for life becomes a freehold interest held by socage or other tenure; a lease for years becomes a new species of rights over land, called leasehold interests or chattels real.

Of the non-free inhabitants three principal classes are mentioned in Domesday—the villani, the servi, and the class which includes the persons called cotarii, cotetiae, bordarii. It was by the forced service of these three classes that the domain of the lord, that is, the land not held of him by freemen rendering free services, or by farmers, was cultivated. The most important of these are the villani. They were

---

1 See the specimen of a charter of feoffment of the time of Henry II given below, p. 60.
2 If the lord retained no lands in his own hands, but all the lands within the manor were held by free tenants, he was said to have a seignory, or a seignory in gross.
3 See the title of the Ely Domesday (Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 86), where it is provided that the inquiry should be based on the oaths of (amongst others) six villani from every villa. The villeins on the manors in the king's hands at the time of the Survey appear to have usually enjoyed or acquired some peculiar privileges. In later times the copyhold tenants
CHAP. I. _adscripti glebae_, tied to the land; they could not remove from one manor to another. They seem to have held plots of land of considerable extent, and the very fact of their not being removable, of son succeeding father in the occupation of his plot, and in the obligation to render services, no doubt gave rise to various customs, or helped to preserve customs already in existence, such as allowing the villein's eldest or youngest son, or all his sons in equal shares, to succeed to the father's beneficial interests (usually on making some payment to the lord), recognising estates of inheritance, for life, or years, allowing the villein to feed his cattle on the waste, and the like. These customs virtually gave the villein rights and duties in relation to his lord, and, as will be seen, grew into local laws. If the villein could not depart from the land, no more could the lord remove him so long as he rendered the service due to the lord. That these villeins were a large and important class Domesday everywhere bears witness. There would be little distinction between the lowest class of freemen and the highest class of villeins: the one would gradually pass into the other. Freemen sometimes held lands by villein services.

The _servi_ were mere slaves, who were sold and transferred from one lord to another without being attached to any land. In later legal language they are styled villeins in gross, as opposed to villeins attached to the land, who are called villeins regardant.

The _cotarii_, _cotsetlae_, or _bordarii_, were cottagers holding small plots of land. This class were also bound to render on these manors were called tenants in ancient demesne. See Blackstone, ii. p. 99.

1 'Cil qui custinient la terre ne doit l'am travailler se de leur droite cense, nonn le leist a seignurage de partir les cultiveurs de lur terre pur tant cum il pusent le deit servise faire.' 'Those who cultivate the land ought not to be harassed beyond their proper fixed amount; nor is it lawful for the lords to remove the cultivators from the land so long as they are able to render the due service.'—Laws of William the Conqueror, xxix; Thorpe's Ancient Laws and Institutes, p. 450. See also laws xxx, xxxi.

2 See above, p. 24, note 2.
compulsory services, and were no doubt before long confounded with the villani. This relation of the villeins or non-free inhabitants to the land gradually passes into an interest recognised by custom under the name of villenagium, and finally into a tenure protected by law under the name of copy-hold or customary tenure.\footnote{As to the condition of the non-free classes after the Conquest, see Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. pp. 426–431.}

Such were the various phases of the relation of lord and tenant which took root in the interval between the Conquest and the reign of Henry II. It remains to notice what has from the date of the complete constitution of manors been their most important characteristic—the manorial courts.
When a large district comprising several manors was held by a single lord in whom was vested by grant or long usage the complete jurisdiction of the hundred, the district was called a liberty or honour.\footnote{See Assize of Clarendon, c. 9; Stubbs, Select Charters, 143; Magna Carta c. 43; ib. p. 302.} In such a case there might be, and usually was, only one court held for the whole; but that court was regarded as the court of each several manor.\footnote{Scriven on Copyholds, i. p. 5.} The honour is merely the aggregate of several manors, it has no distinct or separate organisation.\footnote{Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 400.} It is therefore only necessary to inquire into the constitution and nature of the manor courts.

The principal manorial court is the Court Baron, or the assembly of the freehold tenants of the lord. Besides the Court Baron, in many manors there is also a Court Leet, which is sometimes held with the Court Baron; and wherever, as is usually the case at the present day, there are copy-holders\footnote{See Chap. V. § 6.} within the manor, there is also a third court, called the Customary Court. This court too is often held with a Court Baron.

‘A court baron,’ says Sir Edward Coke, ‘is the chief prop and pillar of a manor, which no sooner faileth, but the manor

\footnote{As to the condition of the non-free classes after the Conquest, see Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. pp. 426–431.}

\footnote{See Assize of Clarendon, c. 9; Stubbs, Select Charters, 143; Magna Carta c. 43; ib. p. 302.}

\footnote{Scriven on Copyholds, i. p. 5.}

\footnote{Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 400.}

\footnote{See Chap. V. § 6.}
The same passage gives Coke’s view of the history of these courts: ‘For when the ancient kings of this realm, who had all the lands of England in demesne, did confer great quantities of land upon some great personages, with liberty to parcel the land out to other inferior tenants, reserving such duties and services as they thought convenient, and to keep courts where they might redress misdemeanors within their precincts, punish offences committed by their tenants, and decide and debate controversies arising within their jurisdiction; these courts were termed court barons.’

Thus, according to the older explanation, the manor courts, like the manor itself, resulted originally from a grant by the crown. Probably, however, though a grant may in fact in many cases have added to the powers and jurisdiction of the manorial courts, the court baron is primarily the successor of the ancient assembly of the village or township. When the district in which the township is situated comes under the power of a great man by express grant or otherwise, the court of the township becomes the court of the great man. It has been seen that it was common to acquire exemptions for particular districts from the court of the hundred, and this must have become almost universal, except in cases where, as seems to have sometimes happened, the hundred court itself came to be amalgamated with the court of some great lord. Thus either by the creation of a franchise exempt from the jurisdiction of the hundred court, or by the amalgamation of the hundred with the manorial courts, the jurisdiction civil and criminal exercised by the court of the hundred comes to be exercised in the manorial courts. The court baron exercised civil jurisdiction especially in matters relating to the freehold lands within the manor. Criminal jurisdiction was amongst the functions of the court leet, and depended on a real or supposed grant from the crown. It has already been seen that the later Anglo-Saxon grants usually contained words ex-

---

1 Coke’s Copyholder, xxxi.
2 Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 400.
3 See below, Chap. II. § 2.
pressly granting the right of jurisdiction, probably referring to the criminal jurisdiction exercised by the court leet.

The manor courts therefore may be regarded as representing one side of the old assembly of the township, in which the jurisdiction properly belonging to the hundred court has come to be vested. The constitution of the court baron is consistent with this view. The freemen, or rather, as they have now come to be, the freehold tenants of the manor, are the judges of the court; the lord or his steward is simply the president. Thus the continuance of a sufficient number of freehold tenants within the manor is essential to the maintenance of the court baron, and so to the continuance of the manor itself. The functions of this court were partly administrative, partly judicial. The business relating to the interests of the various dwellers within the manor was here transacted; probably in some manors the customs of the manor would from time to time be declared in this court, grants of the waste sanctioned, rights of common regulated. The judicial functions of this court varied in different manors. The court leet held either separately or in conjunction with the court baron had jurisdiction over crimes committed within the manor, and the court baron over civil suits arising within the same limits, especially over all matters relating to the freehold. This jurisdiction however was gradually curtailed and overridden by the judicial organisation carried into effect by Henry II.

In some respects the characteristics of the leet, even more than those of the court baron, seem to carry us back to the earliest form of political organisation. The leet is the assembly of the whole community, and seems to date from a time when that community was small, and could gather under a tree, on the side of a hill, or upon a village green, and

---

1 See above, p. 14.
2 'The leet is the most ancient court in the land.' Year Book, 7 Hen. VI.
3 Ritsen on Courts Leet, p. ix.
transact business affecting the interests of all its members. The principal matters dealt with in the leet were the view of frank-pledge, the presentment and punishment of offences and nuisances, the regulation of the quality and prices of provisions, particularly of bread and ale. The leet is said to be derived out of the Sheriff’s ‘tourn.’ The conception of the lawyers is that the organisation of the counties and hundreds having been arranged by King Alfred, a portion of the jurisdiction of the courts of the county and hundred was at some time or other granted by the crown to the various lords of manors. As has been seen above, it is probably more correct to describe all the species of manorial courts as the successors of the old Teutonic moots or assemblies, which have by grant or usurpation obtained for their suitors immunity from the regular jurisdictions, and by acquiring in process of time different functions have come to be regarded as different courts. In some respects the court leet retained in the most marked form the traces of its origin. It has always been regarded as the court of the residents within the district, not of the tenants of the manor, and the matters of which it takes cognisance are for the most part not connected with tenure.

The customary court does not come to be of importance till copyhold or customary tenure has become established, and the notice of it may therefore be deferred.

Thus the great features of the period extending from the Conquest to the beginning of the reign of Henry II are the

1 The style of the court in later times is the ‘view of frank-pledge.’ This was the production of the pledges or persons responsible for each other keeping the peace. Frank-pledge (A.S. frē-borh) ought properly to have been rendered ‘pledges of peace.’ The Normans however seem to have mistaken frē, ‘peace,’ for frē, ‘free,’ and hence the erroneous translation.

2 So far it is carried that a stranger passing by may be compelled to serve on the leet jury. The fact of his being found within the district is deemed sufficient residence. Ritson, p. 26.

3 The jurisdiction of the leet was probably cut down by the 42nd chapter of Magna Carta (ed. 1217, Stubbs, p. 346), by which it is provided that the sheriff is to make his tourn in the hundred twice only in the year, and that the view of frank-pledge is to take place only at Michaelmas.

4 See Chap. V. § 6.
establishment of the notion of tenure and the development of the manorial system. Every free tenant (and none other is regarded as having a legal interest in the land at all) holds of and in relation to a lord. The lord who is not in actual possession has a seignory, which he in his turn holds of a superior, till the head of the system—the king—is reached.

The gradual definition of the respective interests of lord and tenant, the development of the various kinds of interests in lands, their distinction in point of duration, joint ownership, and so forth, belongs to the period when the constitution was so far organised as to admit of the action of regular tribunals having regard to precedent and authority. The reign of Henry II is the period to which the origin of the English law of land in its modern form must be referred. It will be seen in the next chapter how great an advance had been made before the end of that reign in the direction of the separation of law and custom, and of establishing fundamental legal principles on a firm basis.

SECTION III.

ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS.

§ 1. Anglo-Saxon Grants of Bookland.

The following three charters are taken from Kemble’s Codex Diplomaticus Ævi Saxonici, as specimens illustrating the main characteristics of Anglo-Saxon customary law above referred to.

GIFT OF LANDS TO A CHURCH by UUIHTRED OF KENT.
A.D. 700 or 715.

In nomine Domini Dei nostri Jesu Christi. Ego Uuihtredus

1 'A Saxon charter properly so called, and distinguished from a will or the record of a synodal decree, consists of all or some of the following portions: i. the invocation, ii. the proem, iii. the grant, iv. the sanction, v. the date, vi. the testa.' Kemble’s Intro. to Cod. Dipl. p. ix. Charters frequently begin with 'In nomine Domini,' 'In nomine Domini nostri Jhesu Christi,' etc.
CHAP. I. rex Cantuariorum prounidens mihi ¹ in futuro, decreui dare ² aliquid omnia mihi donanti, et, consilio accepto, bonum usum est conferre basilicae beatae Mariae genetricis Dei, quae sita est in loco qui dicitur Limingae, terram III aratorum quae dicitur Pleghelmestun, cum omnibus ad eandem terram pertinentibus, juxta notissimos terminos etc. . . . terraeque quoque partem ejusdem Dei genetrici beatae Mariae similiter in perpetuum possidendum perdone, cujus uocabulum est Rumingseta, ad pastum uidelicet onium trecentorum, ad australem quippe fluminis quae appellatur Liminaea, terminos uero huius terrae ideo non ponimus quoniam ab acolis undique certi sunt. Quam donationem meam uolo firmam esse in perpetuum, ut nec ego seu haeredes mei aliquid immineare praesumant. Quod si aliter temptatum fuerit a qualibet persona sub anathematis interdictione sciat se praecari ³, ad cuius confirmationem pro ignorantia litterarum signum sanctae crucis expressi, et testes idoneos ut subscriberent rogavi, id est Berhtuwaldum archiepiscopum urum venerabilem.

* Ego Berhtuwaldus episcopus rogatus consensi et subscripsi.

* Signum ¹ manus Uuihtredi regis.

¹ The charter then usually goes on to state some religious ground for the gift. "As a general rule it may be observed that before the tenth century the preamble is comparatively simple, that about that time the influence of the Byzantine court began to be felt, and that from the latter half of that century pedantry and absurdity struggle for the mastery."—Kemble, Intro. to Cod. Dipl. p. x.

² No formal words of grant appear to have been required; the usual expressions are, dono, traditi, dabo et concedo. "The granting words are numerous and manifold, and, though part of the formulary, do not appear to be introduced according to any settled and invariable rule. It may be observed of them in general that they are much simpler than the corresponding forms of the Continent, and especially that they show no such strict and formal combinations as those met with in Roman documents. Do, dono, concedo, tradi, are the most in use, sometimes singly, sometimes combined; and one noticeable peculiarity is that in place of the present tense do, we usually have the future dabo."—Kemble, ib. p. xxviii.

³ A clause threatening terrible consequences, generally excommunication and eternal punishment, to any who do not respect the grant, is the fourth characteristic feature in Anglo-Saxon charters. Kemble observes (Cod. Dipl. i. lxv) that "the exclusively clerical nature of the sanction in Anglo-Saxon charters (even where these are grants by private individuals) is evidence of our being indebted for the forms of these instruments to Roman clergymen." In the later charters this clause often presents the extreme of extravagance and pedantry in its language.

⁴ The charters of the Anglo-Saxons were signed, not sealed. The use of the seal was introduced by the Normans. See Kemble, Cod. Dipl. i. ci.
ANGLO-SAXON GRANTS.

Gift by Oswald, Bishop of Worcester. A.D. 963.

Ego Oswald ergo Christi crismate praeulis iudicatus, dominicae incarnationis anno MCCCLXIII, annuente regi Anglorum Eadgaro Ælfæreque Merciorum comite, necon et familiae Wicgornensis ecclesiae, quandam ruris particulam unam uidelicet manus Æthilburgae reginac.

(Then follow the boundaries.)

Scripta est haec cartula his testibus consentientibus quorum inferius notantur nomina.

(Then follow the names.—Codex Diplomaticus, ii. p. 399, No. dix.)

1 This grant is made with the assent of the king and of the earl. This seems to have been usual in the grants of bookland by great men. See above, p. 20, and compare the grant by Wulfhere, A.D. 947, Cod. Dipl. vol. ii. p. 273.

2 According to Kemble (Saxons in England, i. p. 92) magna familia as applied to land, an expression for the hide which was enough for the support of a single family, and which varied in different localities: and see Spelman, sub voc., and above, p. 7, note 2.

3 Kemble has collected (Cod. Dipl. i. xxx seq.) various other instances of grants of interests in lands short of absolute and unqualified inheritances. Two of the most remarkable are the following:—In jus possessionemque sempiternam sibimet ad habendum quandiu vivat, suoque relinquendum fratre germano diutius superest si fuerit . . . . et sic semper in illa consanguinitate paternae generationis, sex quoque virili, perpetuatae consistat adscripsa.' 'Rus etiam hoc modo donatum est, ut suum (mens) masculum possideat et non femininum: et post obitum prospapiæ illius, data sit tam villa quam universa terra, quae in sua postestate est, ad religiosam ecclesiæ, quæ nuncupatur Eofesham.' The case in the text of a grant for life with a further interest to one or two other persons for life, with ultimate reversion to the grantor, is by no means uncommon, especially in leases of church lands. 'An early Anglo-Saxon council had indeed prohibited such grants of a longer term than the life of the grantee, but this, which had probably never been well observed, had fallen into utter desuetude in the tenth century.'—Kemble, Cod. Dipl. i. p. xxxiv. The absence of technical language which prevailed to so great an extent after the Conquest is very remarkable in these grants of limited interests.
CHAP. I.
SECT. III.
§ 1.

CHARTER OF Cnut. A.D. 1033.

P REGNANTE imperpetuum Deo et Domino nostro Jhesu Christo, cum cujus imperio hic labentiis saeculi prosperitas in adversis successibus sedulo permixta et conturbata cernitur, et omnia usibilita et desiderabilia ornamenta hujus mundi ab ipsis amatibilis cotidie transeunt,ideo beati quiue ac sapientes cum his fugitivis saeculi divitiis aeterna et jugiter permansura gaudia caelestis patruee magnopere adipsce propearunt, icticeo ego Cnut rex Anglorum caeterarumque gentium in circuitu persistentium gubernator et rector, quandam mei proprii juris portionem, vi terrae manus, illo in loco ubi jamdum solicoe illius regionis nomen imposuerunt Hortun, meo fidei ministro quem noti atque affines Boui appellare solent confirmo haereditatem, quatinus ille bene perfruat ac perpetuamiter possidet, quondam Deus per suam miraculum misericordiam uitam illi et vitae spiritum concedere voluerit, deinde quoniam sibi succedenti cuicumque libuerit cleronomi jure haereditario dereliquat, ceu supradiximus, in aeternam haereditatem. Maneat igitur hoc nostrum immobile donum aeterna libertate jocundum cum universis quae rite ad eundem locum pertinere donascuntur, tam in magnis quam in modicis rebus, in campis, pasceis, pratis, sisus, ripulis, aquarumque cursibus, sequo quod communi labore quod omnibus liquide patet, uidelicet expeditione, pontis constructione, arcisve munitione. Si autem tempore contigerit aliquo quemquam hominem aliquem antiquiorem librum contra iustius libri libertatem producere pro nichilo computetur. Si quis autem tetri daemonis instinictu hoc nostrum decetum infringere voluerit, sit ipse a sanctis Dei ecclesiis consortio separatus, et infernalibus aeternaliter flammos cup Juda Christi priditore cruciandus, nisi hie prius digna satisfactione poenituerit quod contra nostrum deliquit decretum. Acta vero est praeens pargameni sedula anno dominicae incarnationis millesimo XXXIII, indicatione uero prima. Istis terminis supradicta terra circumgirata est.

(The boundaries follow in Anglo-Saxon.)

Ista chartula illorum testium testimonio est corroborata quorum

1 See above, p. 18.
2 It should be observed that even in this more elaborate form of charter there is no technical form of words used to express the nature of the estate which the grantee is to take or the manner in which it is to be held.
3 See above, p. 13.
4 As to the inductions or cycles of fifteen years, see Kemble, Cod. Dipl. i. lxxvii.
§ 2. A Feoffment in Fee of the time of Henry II.

A comparison of the following document with the Anglo-Saxon grants above given will illustrate the main features of the change which took place in the law of land after the Conquest. It should be especially observed that the charter purports only to be evidence of a grant which had already taken place. The grant of the freehold is effected by actual delivery of the possession, the words written or spoken point out the nature and extent of the interest taken. Then follow the words sibi et haeredibus suis, which have now a technical signification, and denote that the interest to be taken by the grantee is a fee 1, or an estate of inheritance; in other words, an estate descendible to the heirs of the grantee so long as any are in existence, as opposed to an estate given to last only during the grantee’s own life. Then follow the words which form the great characteristic of grants of land for the period extending from the reign of Henry II to the eighteenth year of Edward I, ‘tenendum de me et haeredibus meis.’ There is no longer the conception that property in land is absolute, the property is divided between the tenant in actual possession and his lord, or if there be more than one superior lord, between the tenant, the mesne lord, and the king, each ‘holding of’ the other. If any subordinate interest, say for instance that of the tenant in possession, is eliminated, the 1 Fee has now two senses: (1) it means land held of a lord, as opposed to land owned alodial = fee; (2) an estate of inheritance, as opposed to an estate for life—feodum as opposed to liberum tenementum, also used in a secondary sense for an estate for life. Feodum or fee usually bears the second of the above senses.

CHAP. I. whole of such interest at once devolves upon his immediate superior. So if the heirs of the tenant fail, the land ‘escheats’ to the immediately superior lord. Thus in consequence of this relation between tenant and lord, the tenant’s interest is regarded as something less than the whole property—as an estate of greater or less extent in point of duration, for instance as lasting only for his life, or till all his legitimate heirs have failed. Henceforth therefore the law speaks of estates, and not of property or ownership in land. The notion of tenure also involves the notion of correlative rights and duties existing between the lord and his tenant, of which the service reserved in the grant is the principal. The service mentioned in the following grant is that which is regularly due for a single knight’s fee\(^1\). The latter part of the charter follows the character of the forms in use before the Conquest.

FEOFFMENT IN FEK.

RICARDUS de Luci omnibus hominibus suis atque amiciis Francisci et Anglii tam praesentibus quam futuris totius Anglie salutem. Scias me dedisse et concessisse Radulfo Britone Terram Chigge-willae cum omnibus pertinentibus eadem terrae sibi et haeredibus suis\(^2\) ad tenendum de me et de haeredibus meis in feodo et haereditate per serviciem unius militis\(^3\). Quare volo et firmiter praecepto quod idem Radulfus et haeredes sui terram illam teuant in bene et in pace et libere et quiete et honorifice, in bosco et plano in pratis et pasturis in aquis in viis et semitis et in omnibus aliis rebus quae terrae illi pertinent. Testibus, etc.—(Madox, Formulare Anglicanum, No. cclxxxviii.)

---

\(^1\) See more on this point, below, Chap. III. § 11.

\(^2\) For the effect of these words see below, Chap. III. § 15.

\(^3\) That is, the service of a single knight or fully-armed horseman to serve at his own expense for forty days in the year (Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 432). This is the usual form for expressing that the lands are to be held by actual military service. The minimum of land constituting a knight’s fee seems by this time to have been fixed at the area which was worth twenty pounds annual value. See Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 264. For an account of the probable history of the gradual introduction of knights’ fees, see Stubbs, ib. p. 262, and above, pp. 35, 39.
CHAPTER II.

STATE OF THE LAW RELATING TO LAND IN THE REIGN OF HENRY II.

In the preceding chapter an attempt has been made to trace the working of the various elements of which the common law relating to land is composed. It has been seen that the convergence of distinct streams of customary law, aided by the process of conquest and settlement of the land and the growth of political organisation under a powerful ruler, had resulted in the establishment of a general body of law prevailing throughout the country, with some variations in particular localities.

This body of law may properly be called customary law. It rests for the most part not on any distinct enactment of a legislator or body of legislators, nor does it appeal for its authority to recorded judicial decisions. At the same time it fixes the rights and duties of the inhabitants of the country, it is recognised and enforced by the authority of the assemblies and tribunals. In this early stage of legal history law and custom cannot be distinguished. That a practice is customary is all the justification which would be required if its legality were called in question.\(^1\) In a

---

\(^1\) See Maine’s Village Communities, p. 68.
maturer state of society the distinction between law and custom comes to be clearly marked, though the unhappy phraseology of our legal text-books has tended to obscure the matter by identifying custom with the common law.

According to the analysis of Mr. Austin, which however is applicable only to a civilised community after it has attained to regular legislative and judicial institutions, positive law properly so called may be referred to two sources—direct legislation, and the action of the tribunals. In other words, laws are made either directly in the shape of general rules imposed by or under the authority of the supreme power in the community, or they are made indirectly by the tribunals in deciding upon particular cases.

The latter class of laws are sometimes called judge-made, or judiciary laws. If Mr. Austin’s view that judicial decisions are properly ranked as one of the sources or efficient causes of positive law be accepted, the following may suffice as an account of the mode in which they produce their effect. Inasmuch as the decision of a particular case in a civilised community depends upon some general rule, that is, rests on the assumption that a righteous judge would always give the same decision under the same circumstances, every decision either consists in the application of an actually pre-existing rule of law, or proceeds as if there had been such a rule, when in fact there was none. In the latter case the tribunal in effect makes a law for itself ex post facto. Add to this the tendency in every civilised community that one decision should become the precedent for another, in other words, that a rule once applied by a tribunal of competent authority should be acted upon by other tribunals in similar circumstances.

1 See Blackstone, i. p. 68. On the distinction between custom and law, and the inaccuracy involved in speaking of custom as a source of law, see Austin’s Jurisprudence (Campbell’s edition), pp. 553–560. Mr. Austin’s analysis should however be taken with the qualification suggested by Sir H. Maine (Village Communities, pp. 66–68), that it is applicable only to a mature system of jurisprudence, and not to law in its earlier stages.

2 See Lectures xxviii, xxix, xxxvii.
circumstances, and we have the account of what is called judicial legislation. Suppose, for instance, that there is no fixed rule whether, on the decease of a tenant in fee simple, his grandson (son of a predeceased elder son) or his younger son succeeds to the lands. The question arises for judicial decision. The tribunal decides (no matter on what ground, whether adopting a custom, or following some rule of some other system of law, or on considerations of general expediency,) that the grandson is entitled in preference to his uncle. This solemn decision by a competent tribunal is recorded, and becomes a precedent for other similar decisions. Thus a rule of law is created. It is impossible to say precisely at what point a rule thus acted upon by a tribunal becomes a rule of law. Sometimes a single decision is sufficient, sometimes it requires a series of similar decisions before it can be asserted that the principle forming the ground of the decision has been erected into a rule of law. The simplicity or complexity of the proposition, the weight and eminence of the tribunal, the circumstances attending the decision, all influence the conditions requisite for the establishment of the proposition as a rule of law. When however it is for all practical purposes certain that a definite rule, having been the ground of judicial decision on one or more occasions, will be again acted upon by the tribunals whenever occasion arises, the rule may be said to have become a rule of law. It may have existed previously as a rule of custom, or a rule of a foreign system of law, but its adoption by the tribunals gives it a new and different character, and causes it to take its place amongst the laws of the land.

It is not necessary here to inquire whether this analysis of 1 Judicial decisions are usually spoken of in the text-books (see the chapter in Blackstone, vol. i. Of the Laws of England) not as the source of laws, but as evidence of a preexisting law. The examination of this view, which would at the present day have few theoretical supporters, though its practical influence is still considerable, would occupy too much space. The reader is therefore referred to the lectures of Mr. Austin mentioned above.

CHAP. II. judiciary law is applicable in equal degree to all systems of law. It appears at all events to afford a sufficiently accurate description of the main process by which in our own country law customary has been transmuted into law positive. The early date at which this process began, and the rapid and effective mode in which the concentrated action of the courts was brought to bear so as to create a uniform body of law, may be traced in the extracts from Glanvill and Bracton given in this and the next chapter.

As has been said above, positive law properly so called does not arise until a community has progressed sufficiently to have attained to settled legislative and judicial institutions. Accordingly in our own country we find the first existence of a body of law properly so called, as opposed to a floating mass of custom, contemporaneous with the completion of the political organisation. The reign of Henry II is the starting-point of the history of modern English law, as well as of the modern English constitution.

Of the two sources of law above noticed, direct or proper legislation, and indirect or judicial legislation, the field of direct legislation, or of Statute Law, is as yet very limited. There are however various important legislative acts during this reign. But with the exception of the great changes made in the procedure of the tribunals, especially in the institution of the grand assize and recognitions¹, they have little bearing on the law relating to land.

It is to the organisation of the judicial institutions of the country that the rapid development of the Common Law²

¹ See extracts from Glanvill, below, §§ 2 and 9.
² The expression Common Law will henceforward be frequently employed. It must be borne in mind that the expression is used (1) in opposition to Statute Law, (2) in opposition to Equity, (3) in opposition to Civil or Roman Law. The Common Law is (1) that portion of the present or former law of the land which does not rest on Statute; the judicial decisions of the Courts of Common Law, the King's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, as they existed up to November 1, 1875, when the new arrangement and consolidation of the Courts by the Judicature Acts 1873 and 1875 took effect, are according to Blackstone the evidence, according to Austin the source, of the Common Law. (2) In its relating to land which took place in the interval between Chap. II.

the beginning of the reign of Henry II and the end of that of Henry III is owing. It has been seen, in the preceding chapter, that in the various manors the manor court had jurisdiction over questions arising within the manor. But supreme over all was the King's Court (Curia Regis), which partook of the character of the supreme Court Baron, and was also the chief national legislative and judicial institution of the country. The king, in his combined capacity of sovereign of the nation and lord paramount of all the land, asserted his right to adjudicate by himself or his representatives upon all questions relating to the freehold, and to control the local jurisdictions of the lords of the manors.
The jurisdiction of the royal or central court was exercised partly at Westminster or elsewhere, where the king's court happened to be in attendance upon the king's person, partly by the organisation of itinera or progresses by members of the Curia Regis for judicial and other purposes throughout the country.

Thus there came into existence regular judicial institutions with all their concomitants. The practice of recording decisions given by men who became in fact professional judges, the discussion and sifting of points of law, the desire to attain second sense, Common Law is that portion of the law which was administered in the former Common Law tribunals, and thus is opposed to Equity, or the law administered by the Court of Chancery before Nov. 1, 1875, and to the law administered in the Ecclesiastical tribunals and their successors (the Courts of Probate and Divorce), and the Court of Admiralty, which also on Nov. 1, 1875, ceased to have a separate existence, and were succeeded by the Probate Division of the High Court of Justice. (2) When opposed to Civil or Roman Law, Common Law includes Equity.

1 As to the Curia Regis, its composition and relation to the Council, see Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 22; and for the formation of a regular Supreme Court of Justice by Henry II, see the extract from Benedictus Abbas (i. 207)
2 See the form of writ given below, § 2.
3 See, for an account of the history of these circuits, Stubbs, Select Charters, 4 The Rotuli Curiae Regis, the earliest law reports at present printed, begin in the sixth year of the reign of Richard I.
CHAP. II. to uniformity of legal rules throughout the country, are all characteristic of the time of Henry II.

Amongst the causes of the rapid development of the Common Law as a system should be taken into account the powerful effect upon men's imagination of the Roman Law. There can be little question that acquaintance with a mature system of foreign law must have greatly accelerated the process of simplifying and systematising floating custom, and of bringing the body of native customary law into some resemblance to a regular corpus juris. The direct effect of the Roman Law upon the law of England is not however very conspicuous till the reign of Henry III, when its influence appears in almost every line of Bracton's great treatise.

The connexion of the growth of the Common Law with the development of judicial institutions is strikingly exemplified in the treatise of Glanvill, who was Chief Justiciar for the last nine years of this reign. The object of this work is the exposition of the practice of the King's Court. It deals principally with procedure or the mode of enforcing legal rights, but incidentally also with the rights themselves. In the county courts held before the sheriff, and in the courts of the lords of the manors, so great was the variety of the customs which were observed and enforced, that Glanvill declines to attempt any statement of them. But in the reign of Henry II the principle had become firmly established that the king or his justices had cognizance of every suit relating to land. No plea relating to the freehold could be held unless the proceeding was commenced by writ or precept issuing from the king under the great seal. Directly or indirectly, means were provided for bringing the suit before the representatives of the king, and thus the au-

1 In this country the growth of the study of the Roman Law is marked by the lectures of Sacius in Oxford A.D. 1149. From this time forward the study of the Civil and Canon Law progressed rapidly, without at first coming into collision, as was afterwards the case, with the Common Law.

2 See Glanvill, lib. xii. cap. 6, and lib. xiv. cap. 8.

3 See below, § 2.
thority of the royal court was felt throughout the length and breadth of the land; the rules which the Curia Regis observed became the general law of the land. In some localities customs still prevailed which were sufficiently strong to be adopted as local laws. Thus in Kent, in many boroughs, notably in London and York, local customs obtained the force of laws which differed in some respects, especially as to the mode of devolution of lands ab intestato and power of disposition by will, from the general law of the land. The tendency however of the action of the Curia Regis, subject to these and other important exceptions, was to establish a uniform system of law and to override local custom.

The treatise of Glanvill being principally upon procedure, the rights recognised and enforced by the Curia Regis are only incidentally noticed. The following extracts will however be found to throw light on some of the most important points in the early law of land.

Extracts from Glanvill.

§ 1. Customary and Positive Law.

The following extract from Glanvill’s preface illustrates the transition above indicated from customary law to positive law properly so called, and the introduction of the allusion to Roman Law seems to show how powerful an influence the conception of a systematic body of written law had upon the writer’s mind.

Glanvill. De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Regni Angliae.

Regiam potestatem non solum armis contra rebelles et gentes sibi regnoque insurgentes oportet esse decoratam, sed et legibus ad subditos et populos pacifice regendos decet esse ornatum. . . . Cum tantae aequitatis sit suae celsitudinis curia, ut in ea nullus judicum tam attritae frontis, tam temerariae sit præsumptionis, qui a JUSTITIAE transit aliquatenus audacat declinare, aut veritati ullatenus præsumat contrarie. Ibi enim pauperem non opprimit adversarii potentia, nec a limitibus judiciorum propellit quemquam.
CHAP. II. amicorum favor aut gratia. Legibus namque regni et consuetudinem de ratione introductis et diu obtentis, et, quod laudabilius est, talium virorum, licet subditorum, Rex noster non designatur consilio, quos morum gravitate, peritia juris et Regni consuetudinem, suae sapientiae et eloquentiae praerogativa, allis novit praecellere, et ad causas mediantia justitia decidendas, et lites dirimendas, nunc severius nunc mitius agendo, prout viderint expedire, ipsis rerum argumentis comperit cum ratione promptissimos. Leges namque Anglicanas, licet non scriptas, leges appellari non videtur absurdum, cum hoc ipsum lex sit quod principi placet et legis habet vigorem 1; eas scilicet quas super dubii in consilio definitis procurationes quidem consilio, et principis accedente auctoritate, constat esse promulgatas. Si enim ob scripturam solvendum defectum leges minime censerentur, majoris procul dubio auctoritatis robur ipsa legibus videretur accommodare scriptura, quam vel decernentis aequitas, vel ratio statuens. Leges autem et jura regni scripto universaliter concludi nostris temporibus omnino quidem impossibile est, cum propter scribentium ignorantiam, tum propter carum multitudinem confusam; verum sunt quasdam in curia generalia et frequentius usitata, quae scripto commendare non mihi videtur praeeminenta, sed et plerisque perutile, et ad adjuvandum memoriam admodum necessarium. Horum itaque particularum quodam in scripta redigere decrevi, stilo vulgari, et verbis curialiibus utens ex industria, ad notiam comparandam eis qui hujusmodi vulgaritate minus sint exercitati.

§ 2. Supremacy of Curia Regis in matters relating to the Freehold.

The following passages illustrate what has been said above as to the concentration of jurisdiction relating to the freehold in the hands of the Curia Regis, and the consequent establishment of a uniform system of law.

The fundamental rule, now completely recognised, which 1 See Just. Inst. i. 2. 6. Glanvill is here defending the application of the term ‘law’ to the body of customs which prevailed in England. He contends that at any rate that portion of the customs prevailing throughout England, which have been recognised and acted upon by the king and his council, may legitimately be called ‘laws,’ and for this position the authority of the Institutes is referred to. As to the apparent reluctance to use the term ‘law,’ see Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 274, note 1. produced this result was that no one was bound to answer in Chap. II.

the court of his lord concerning his freehold without the king’s writ.

The writs given below (lib. i. cap. 6, lib. xii. cap. 3) constitute the appropriate mode of commencing that form of real action called a writ of right. The object of this is to determine a disputed right of property in the land, the question to be decided being—which of the two litigants majus jus habet in the land in question. Opposed to the writ of right is, as will be seen later, the mode of remedy which only goes to decide which of the two has the right to the possession of the land. A writ of right might before Magna Carta either be brought directly in the Curia Regis, in which case the writ is addressed to the sheriff, and is similar in form to other actions; or it might be commenced in the territorial court by writ from the king; thence, if the court should be proved to have failed in doing right, the suit might be re moved into the county court by precept of the sheriff, and from thence again by writ from the king into the Curia Regis. By an important provision of Magna Carta the right to issue the writ so as in the first instance to bring the suit in the king’s court was abandoned. After this enactment

1 The distinction between real and personal actions is given by Bracton (102; see Reeves, vol. i. 336). Real actions had for their object the assertion of the claimant’s right to the possession or property of a freehold interest in land, and resulted in the recovery of the right. Personal actions usually had for their object the assertion of the right to damages for injuries to persons or to property, or for breaches of contract. Like many other distinctions in our law, this phraseology was borrowed from the Roman Law, and is derived from the distinction between actio in rem and actio in persona. The Roman actio in rem had for its object the assertion of the right to property in anything which was the subject of property, whether moveable or immovable.
Actio in persona had for its object the assertion of an obligation in cumbent on a particular person to do or render something to the plaintiff.
The prominence of freehold interests in lands, as the subject-matter of rights, accounts for the narrower scope of ‘real actions’ in English Law. See further as to real actions below, § 9.

2 Magna Carta (John) c. 34:—‘Breve quod vocatur “praecipe” de cetero non fiat aliqui de aliquo tenemento unde liber homo amittere poscit curiam suam.’
proceedings were instituted in the first instance in the branch of the Curia Regis called after Magna Carta the Court of Common Pleas only when the lord gave, or was supposed to have given, license to the tenant to bring his action in that court, or when the lord held no court, or when the tenant held directly of the king.

Lib. xii. c. 25. Praetera sciant quod secundum consuetudines regni nemo tenetur respondere in curia domini sui de aliquo libero tenemento suo sine praeceto domini regis vel ejus capitalis justiciae.

Lib. i. c. 5. Cum clamat quis domino regi aut ejus justiciis de feodo aut de libero tenemento suo, si fuerit querela talis, quod debeat vel quod dominus rex velit eam in curia sua deduci tunc is qui querit itaque breve de summonitioh cebet:—

6. Rex Vicecomiti salutem. Praecipe A. quod sine dila-

1 Commnia placita (suit between subject and subject) non sequantur curiam nostram, sed teneantur in aliquo loco certo. (c. 17.) From this time forward the Court of Common Pleas had exclusive jurisdiction in the case of all real actions.

2 This was expressed by the addition at the end of the writ of the words 'Qua dominus remisit curiam suam.' This became in process of time a mere form. See Blackstone, vol. iii. Appendix 1, § 4.

3 See Blackstone, iii. p. 195; Ficherbert, Natura Brevium, i. pp. 1-5.

4 The word 'tenements' now comes the technical expression for freehold interests in things immovable, considered as subjects of property, they being not 'owned,' but 'held.' This word is however not confined to this class of interests, but is also applied to the class of rights called incorporeal hereditaments; see below, Appendix to Part I, § 1 (7), (11). For the technical meaning of 'lands,' 'tenements,' and 'hereditaments,' see Blackstone, book ii. chap. 2.

5 The writ or precept addressed by the king to the sheriff or chief lord as the case might be. This was the regular mode of commencing an action at law.

6 As to the office and functions of the chief justiciar, see Stubbe, Select Charters, pp. 16, 17, and Const. Hist. i. p. 346.

7 As to the justices, see Stubbe, Select Charters, p. 17.

8 The word 'feudum' has now lost its original sense of land granted to be held as a benefice opposed to land granted to be held alodially: see above, p. 32. No alodial land remained in England. Feudum or fee is now always used in its secondary sense of 'an estate of inheritance' (see p. 59), i.e. an interest in land descendible to heirs. (As to who 'heirs' are, see below, § 6.)

9 As to the office of the sheriff, see Stubbe, Select Charters, pp. 9, 14, 22, and for the history of the term vicerecomes see Const. Hist. i. 269, note 1.
tione reddat B. unam hidam\(^1\) terrae in villa\(^2\) illa unde idem B. CHAP. II. queritur quod praedictus A. ei deforceat: et nisi fecerit, summone eum per bonos summonites quod sit ibi coram me vel justiciarum meis in crastino post octabas clausi Paschae\(^3\) apud locum illum, ostensurum quare non fecerit. Et habetas ibi summonites et hoc breve. Teste Ranulpho de Glanville apud Clarendon\(^4\).

Lib. xii. c. 1. Praedicta quidem placita de recto\(^5\) directe et ab initio veniunt in curia domini regis, et ibi, ut dictum est, deducuntur et terminantur. Quandoque etiam sicet ab initio non veniant in curia domini regis quaedam placita de recto, veniunt tamen per translationem, ubi curiae diversorum dominorum pro-bantur de recto defecisse; tune enim mediante comitatu\(^6\) possunt a comitatu, ex diversis causis quae superius expositae sunt, ad capitalem curiam domini regis transferri\(^7\).

c. 2. Cum quis itaque clamet aliquod liberum tenementum vel servitium tenendum de alio per liberum servitium, non poterit inde trabere tenentem in placitum sine brevi domini regis vel ejus justiciarum; habebit ergo ad dominum suum, de quo ideam clamat.

\(^1\) As to the hide, see above, p. 7, note 2.
\(^2\) The writ specifies the district in which the lands are situate. As to the villa, see above, p. 43, note 3.
\(^3\) 'On the morrow after the octave of Easter.' (See Spelman, Glossary, s. v. Clausum.)
\(^4\) The mode of trial of a writ of right forms the subject of the remainder of the first and second book of Glanville. His account, though very curious in reference to the history of the law of procedure, has no bearing on that of the law of land. The cause, when ripe for trial, was decided either by the duel, or, under the great improvement of the law effected by an ordinance of Henry II, of which we only hear in Glanville, by the grand assize; that is, by the verdict of twelve men of the neighbourhood, chosen by four other milites summoned by the sheriff for the purpose.
\(^5\) Placita de recto, 'suit concerning the (freeshold) right to lands'; 'writ of right.'
\(^6\) For county courts held before the sheriff, see Stubbs, Const. Hist. 1. pp. 114, 393, etc.
\(^7\) The writ by which the cause was removed into the county court was called the writ of \textit{toll}—that by which it was removed from the county court into the curia regis, the writ of \textit{pose}; see specimens in Blackstone, vol. iii. App. 1. Bracton, foll. 329-333, gives an elaborate account of the grounds and mode of transfer of the writ of \textit{right} from the court baron to the county court, and from the county court to the curia regis. This transfer must have been very common from the earliest times, and it became in process of time a matter of course, the grounds alleged in the \textit{writs of toll} and \textit{pose} being merely fictitious.
CHAPTER II.

Tenere, breve de recto. Quod, si placitum fuerit de terra, tale erit:——

§ 2. c. 3. Rex Comiti W. salutem. Praecipio tibi quod sine dilatione tenes plenum rectum N. de decem carucatis terrae in Middle ton, quas clamat tenere de te per liberum servitium feodi unius militiae pro omni servitio, vel per liberum servitium centum solidorum per annum pro omni servitio, vel per liberum servitium unde duodecim carucatae terrae faciant feodum unius militiae pro omni servitio, vel quas clamat pertinere ad liberum tenementum suum quod de te tenet in eadem villa, vel in Mortune, per liberum servitium, etc. vel per servitium, etc. vel quas clamat tenere de te de libero maritaggio et matris suae, vel in liberum burgagium, vel in liberum eleemosynam, vel per liberum servitium eundi tecum in exercitum dominii regis cum duobus equis ad custum suum pro omni servitio, vel per liberum servitium inveniendi tibi unum arbelastarium in exercitum dominii regis per quadraginta dies pro omni servitio, quas R. filius W. ei deforciat. Et nisi feceris, Vicecomes de Northampton faciat, ne amplius inde clamorem audiam pro defectu justicie.

c. 6. Solent autem placita ista in curiis dominorum, vel eorum qui loco dominorum habentur, deduci, secundum rationabilia consuetudines ipsarum curiarum; quae tot et tam variæ sunt, ut in scriptum de facii reduci non possunt.

§ 3. Relation of Lord and Free Tenant.

The following passages state the substance of the law as to the relation between the lord and his freehold tenant and their

1 See above, p. 60, note 3.

2 It became at this time very common to commute services due for the land for a money payment. This would not affect the tenure of the lands. Whether the tenure was by knight-service or in socage would still depend on the nature of the services in respect of which the commutation was paid.

3 The language here, which is the common form, seems to point to the process of composition for the general burden of military service by burdening some lands specially with the service to the freedom of the others, and thus constituting knights’ fees. See above, p. 39.

4 As to ‘frank marriage,’ see below, § 7 note.

5 As to burgage tenure, see above, p. 47, and Littleton, lib. ii. c. 10. §§ 162-171.

6 As to libera eleemosyna, see above, p. 38, and Littleton, lib. ii. c. 6. §§ 133-142.
mutual rights and duties. This branch of the law is treated more elaborately by Bracton, but the outline here traced by Glanvill remains substantially unaltered.

The tie which created the relation of lord and tenant, at all events tenant by military service, was homage. Bracton, borrowing from the definition of obligatio by the Roman lawyers, defines homage as ‘juris vinculum quo quis astringitur ad warrantandum, defendendum, et acquietandum tenentem suum in seisina versus omnes per certum servitium in donatione nominatum et expressum; et etiam vice versa quo tenens re obligatur et astringitur ad fidem domino suo servandum et servitium debitum faciendum.’ In the same passage Bracton gives a more detailed statement of the consequences of homage, the obligation it imposes on lord and tenant, and the modes by which the tie may be dissolved. This however belongs so entirely to the obsolete portion of our law that it is needless to pursue the subject into further detail. If by any means, such as escheat for felony, or failure of heirs, or repudiation of his duties as lord, the tie was dissolved as between the tenant and his immediate lord, the intermediate seignory was as it were taken away, and the relation of lord and tenant arose between the tenant and the superior lord of whom the intermediate lord himself had held. The superior lord could not in this case refuse to accept the homage of the tenant, who, as Bracton more than once says, had all along been ‘tenens suum, gnomvis per medium.’ In the same way, if the tenant alienated the whole of his land the alienee would be tenant of the lord of whom the land had been held, and he would be compelled to receive the homage of the alienee.

Lib. ix. c. r. Praedictis restat continuandum de homagiis faciendis et relevii recipiendis. Mortuo siquidem patre vel alio quocunque alicujus antecessore, tenetur dominus feodi ab initio recipere homagium recti haeredis, sive fuerit infra aetatem haeres ipse sive plenam habuerit aetatem, dummodo masculus sit. Feminae

1 Fol. 78 b.
2 See Institutes of Justinian, iii. 13.
3 See Reeves, i. pp. 310-312.
4 See below, § 4.
CHAP. II. enim nullum homagium facere possunt de jure, licet plerumque fidelitatem dominis suis praestare soleant. Veruntamen si fuerint maritatae, mariti earum homagium dominis suis de foedo illorum facere debent. Ita dico si foeda illa homagium debeant. Sin autem haeres masculus fuerit et minor, nullam de jure vel de ipso haerede vel de tenemento suo habere debet custodiam dominus feodi, donec ipsius haereditis reecepterit homagium; quia generaliter verum est quod nullum servitium sive relevium sive aliud potest quis ab haerede, sive fuerit major sive minor, exigere, donec ipsius haereditis reecepterit homagium de tenemento unde servitium habere clamat. Potest autem quis plura homagia diversis dominis facere de foedis diversis diversorum dominorum. Sed unum eorum oportet esse precipuum, et cum ligeancia factum; illi scilicet domino faciendum, a quo tenet suum capitale tenementum is qui homagium facere debet. Fieri autem debet homagium sub hac forma, scilicet ut is qui homagium facere debet, ita fiat homo domini sui, quod fidem illi portet, de illo tenemento unde homagium suum praestat, et quod ejus in omnibus terrenum honorem servet, salva fide debita domino regi et haeredibus suis. Ex hoc liquet quod vassallus non potest dominum suum infestire, salva fide homagii sui, nisi forte se defendendo, vel nisi ex praecepto principis cum eo iverit contra dominum suum in exercitum. Et generaliter nihil de jure facere potest quis salva fide homagii quod vertat ad exhaereditationem domini sui vel ad dedecus corporis sui. Si quis ergo plura homagia pro diversis foedis suis fecerit diversis dominis qui se invicem infestent; si capitalis dominus ejus ei praecepterit quod secum in propria persona sua est contra alium dominum suum, oportet eum ejus praecepto in hoc obtemperare, salvo tamen servitio alterius domini de foedo quod de eo tenet. Patet itaque ex

1 This seems to have been changed in later times. Littleton speaks of a woman doing homage; lib. ii. c. i. § 87.

2 Fidelitas is the same that fidelitas is in Latin. And when a freeholder doth fealty to his lord he shall hold his right hand upon a book and shall say thus: Know ye this, my lord, that I shall be faithful and true unto you, and faith to you shall bear for the lands which I claim to hold of you, and that I shall lawfully do to you the customs and services which I ought to do, at the terms assigned, so help me God and his Saints. And he shall kiss the book. But he shall not kneel when he makest his fealty, nor make such humble reverence as is aforesaid in homage.—Littleton, Coke’s translation, lib. ii. c. 2. § 91.

3 Compare the form of homage given in Littleton, lib. i. c. 10. § 85. The ceremony was public, in the court of the county or hundred or in the court baron, so that the lord might have witnesses of the fact.

4 See above, p. 35.
praedictis, quod si quis aliquid ad exhaereditationem domini sui fecerit, et super hoc convictus fuerit, feodum quod de eo tenet de jure amittet et haeredes ejus. Idem quoque erit si manus violentas quis in dominum suum injecerit eum laedendo vel atroci injuria afficiendo, et hoc fuerit in curia versus eum legitime comprobatum. Sed utrum in curia domini sui tenetur quis se defendere versus dominum suum de talibus objectis, queso; et utrum dominus suus possit eum ad id faciendum distingere per considerationem curiae suae sine praecepto domini regis vel ejus justiciarum, vel sine brevi domini regis vel ejus capitalis justiciae. Et quidem de jure poterit quis hominem suum per judicium curiae suae deducere et distingere ad curiam suam venire.

* * * * *

Sin autem non poterit quis tenentes suos justiciare, tuncdemum ad curiae refugium erit necessarium decurrere. Potest autem homo liber masculus homagium facere, tam is qui aetatem habet, quam is qui infra aetatem est, tam clericus quam laicus. Episcopi vero consecrati homagium facere non solent domino regi etiam de baronis suis. Sed fidelitatem cum juramentis interpositis ipsi praestare solent. Electo vero in episcopos ante consecrationem suam homagia sua facere solent.

§ 4. Feudal Incidents.

The following extracts detail the various incidental rights and duties appertaining to the relation of lord and tenant as they existed in Glanvill's time.

(1) Reliefs, Aids.

Lib. ix. c. 4. Mutua quidem debet esse dominii et homagii fidelitatis connexio, ita quod quantum homo debet domino ex homaggio, tantum illi debet dominus ex domino praer solam reverentiam. Unde si aliquis alicui donaverit aliquod tenementum pro servitio et homagio suo, quod postea alius versus eum diracionaverit, tenebitur quidem dominus tenementum id ei warrantizare vel competens escambium ei reddere. Sceus est tamen

1 The technical expression for the judgment of a court, which begins "Therefore it is considered," &c.

2 The doctrine of warranty was based upon one of the most primitive of the rules of early Teutonic law. When a person had been wrongfully deprived of a portion of his property—a slave, a horse, or an ox—and found it in the CHAP. II. de eo qui de alio tenet feodum suum sicut haereditatem suam, et unde fecerit homagium; quia licet is terram illam amittat, non teneatur ei dominus ad escambium. Mortuo vero patre vel antecessore aliejuus ut praedictum est, et haerede relictio qui infra setatem sit, nullum jus habet dominus feodi in custodia haereditatis, nisi prius recepto homagio haeredis. Recepto vero homagio, in custodia ipsius domini remanebit haeres ipsa cum haereditate sua sub forma praedicta, donec plenam habuerit setatem. Tandem vero eodem ad setatem perveniente et facta ei haereditatis restitutione, quietus erit a relevio ratione custodiae. Mulier vero haeres aliejuus relict, sive plenam habuerit setatem, sive infra setatem fuerit, in custodia domini sui remanabit, donec de consilio domini sui marittetur. Verum si infra setatem fuerit, quando dominus suus in custodiem illam receperit, tunc, ipsa possession of another, the true owner could of course claim that which was his own. If the person having the thing in his possession had bought it from a third person, he could vouch the third person to warranty, that is, call upon him to defend the title to the chattel, and, if the superior title were established, to make recompense to the evicted possessor. If the warranty was not accepted, the person vouching to warranty must establish that he purchased from the person vouched (and for this purpose the Anglo-Saxon laws contain elaborate provisions as to the necessity of a purchaser providing witnesses of the purchase), and the identity of the thing purchased with that claimed. (See Laws of Hlothære and Ælfric, 7, 16, Thorpe, Ancient Laws and Institutes, ed., pp. 12, 14; Laws of Æthelred, 8, 9, Thorpe, p. 123.) Upon the acceptance of the warrantor the suit as to the title to the chattel proceeded between the claimant and the warrantor, and if the claimant was successful he recovered the chattel, and the warrantor was bound to recompense his vendee. If at the time of the claim the vouchee were dead, the possessor of the thing claimed could ‘vouch the tomb’ of the vendor, and follow his property wherever it were for the purpose of obtaining a recompense. (Laws of Æthelred, 59; and see Alfred and Guthrum’s Peace, art. 4, ib. p. 67; Laws of King Edward, ib. p. 68; and see the form of oath to be taken by the claimant and the innocent purchaser, ib. p. 76.) In the development of the English law of land the doctrine of warranty was applied mainly to the obligation on the part of the donee of land and his heirs to defend the estate of the donee and his heirs. The primitive rules of law formed the basis of doctrines of the greatest complication and technicality, which, as will be seen later, received a most important practical application in affording facilities for the conversion of an estate ‘tall’ into an estate in fee simple. See below, Chap. V. § 2.

1 As to relief, see above, p. 39.
2 As to the right of marriage, see above, p. 41.
maritata, quinta crit haereditas illa a relevio, quantum ad se et CHAP. II.
quanta ad virum suum. Sin autem habuerit actatem eo tempore, licet aliquandiu in custodia domini sui remaneat antequam maritetur, relevium tamen dabit maritus suus qui illam in uxorem duxit. Semel autem praestitum relevium a marito alicujus mulieris, utrumque, sicut tam maritum quam uxorem, tota vita sua de relevio ipsius haereditatis acquietabit. Quia nec mulier ipsa nec secundus maritus suus, si secundo nupserit praemortuo viro suo, nec primus maritus suus praemortuos uxore sua, terram illam iterum relevabit. Cum autem haeres masculus et notus haeres actatem habens relinquatur, in sua haereditate se tenebit, ut supra dictum est, etiam invito domino; dum tamen domino suo, sicut tenetur, sumum offerat homagium coram prohis hominibus, et sumum rationabile relevium. Dicitur autem rationabile relevium aliquis, juxta consuetudinem regni de feodo unius militis, centum solidi; de scagio vero quantum valet censeus illius scagii per unum annum; de baronis vero nihil certum statutum est, quia juxta voluntatem et misericordiam domini regis solent baroniae capitales de releviis suis domino regi satisfacere 1. Idem est de serjanterias. Si vero dominus ipsa nec homagium, nec rationabile relevium ipsius haereditatis velit recipere, tunc relevium ipsam salvo custodiam, et proi probos homines id saepius domino suo offerat.
Qui si nullatenus id recipere voluerit, tunc haeres ipsa de domino suo domino regi vel ejus justiciis conqueratur, et tale breve inde habebit:—

c. 5. Rex vicecomiti salutem. Praeipe N. quod juste et sine dilatatione recipiat homagium et rationabile relevium R. de libero tenemento quod tenet in illa villa, et quod de eo teneri clamat; et nisi fecerit, summone eum per bonos summuniores quod sit coram me vel justiciis meis eo die ostensurus quare non fecerit.

1 Compare the charter of Henry I, c. 3, Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 100.
'Si quis baronium, comitum meorum sive allorum qui de me tenent, mortuos fuert, haeres suus non redimet terram suam sicut faciebat tempore fratris mei, sed justa et legitima relevacione relevabit eam. Similiter et homines baronium meorum justa et legitima relevacione relevabunt terras suas de dominis suis.' The amount of relief payable by a baron was fixed by Magna Carta, c. 2. See Chapter III. § 1.

As to aids, see above, p. 40.
CHAP. II. secundum facultates, ne nimis gravari inde videantur, vel suum contentementum amittere. Nihil autem certum\(^1\) statutum est de hujusmodi auxiliis dandis vel exigendis, nisi ut praedicta forma inviolabiliter observetur. Sunt praeterea aliæ casus in quibus licet dominis auxilia similis, sed sub formas praescipita, exigere ab hominibus suis: relati si filius et haeres suus miles fiat, vel si primogenitum filiam suam maritaverit. Utrum vero ad guerram suam manutenendum possint domini hujusmodi auxilia exigere, quaero\(^2\). Obtinet autem quod non possunt ad id tenentes dstringere de jure, nisi quatenus facere velint. Possunt autem domini tenentes suos ad hujusmodi rationabilia auxilia reddenda etiam suum jure, sine praecipito domini regis vel ejus capitalis justiciae, per judicium curiae suae dstringere per catalla quae in ipsis foedis invenerint, vel per ipsa foeda si opus fuerit; ita\(^3\) tamen quod ipsi tenentes inde deducantur juste secundum considerationem curiae suae et consuetudinem rationabilem. Si ergo ad hujusmodi auxilia rationabilia reddenda posset aliquis dominus tenentes suos ita dstringere, multo fortius distinctionem eo modo licee poterit facere pro ipso relevio suo, vel pro necessario servitio suo de foedo suo sibi debito. Verum si dominus potens non fuerit tenentem suum pro servitius suis vel consuetudinibus justiciare; tunc durrentur eum et ad auxilium regis vel capitalis justiciae, et tale breve inde habebit:—

C. 9. Rex Vicecomiti salutem. Praecipio tibi quod justicies\(^4\) N. quod juste et sine dilatione faciat R. consuetudines et recta servitia quae ei facere debet de tenemento suo quod de eo tenet in illa villa, sicut rationabiliter monstrare poterit eum sibi deberi, ne oporteat cum amplius inde conqueri pro defectu recti.

(2) GUARDIANSHIP IN CHIVALRY OR KNIGHT SERVICE.

Lib. vii. c. 9. Sunt enim quidam haeredes, de quibus constat etios esse majores, de quibus dubium est utrum sint maiiores an minores. Haeredes vero maiiores statim post deceassum antecessorum suorum possunt se tenere in haereditate sua, licet domini possint foedum suum cum haerede

\(^1\) See Magna Carta (John), c. 12; below, Chap. III. § 5.
\(^2\) See above, p. 35, and below, Chap. III. § 11.
\(^3\) A writ of justices was in the nature of a special commission to the sheriff, giving him authority to adjudicate in the particular case in the county court.
in manus suas capere; ita tamen moderate id fieri debet, ne aliquam disseisinam haeredibus faciant: possunt enim haeredes, si opus fuerit, violentiae dominorum resistere, dum tamen parati sunt releviun et alia recta servitìa cùs inde facere. Si vero constet eos esse minores, tunc ipsi haeredes tenentur esse sub custodia dominorum suorum donec plenam habuerint aetatem (si fuerint haeredes de feodo militari), quod sit post viceśimum et unum annum completum, si fuerit haeres et filius militia vel per feodum militare tenentis. Si vero haeres et filius sokemanni fuerit, aetatem habere intelligitur tunc cum quindicim compleverit annum. Si vero fuerit filius burgensis, aetatem habere tunc intelligitur, cum discrete sciverit denarios numerare et pannos ulnare, et alia paterna negotia similiter exercere. Plenam itaque custodiam habent domini filiorum et haeredum hominum suorum et feodorum suorum, ita quod plenam inde habent dispositionem, ut in ecclesiis, in custodiis ipsis constitutis, concedendis, et in mulieribus (si quae in eorum custodiam exciderint), maritandis, et in alīs negotiis disponendīs, secundum quod propria negotia sus disponere solent.

Nihil tamen de haereditate de jure alienare possunt ad remanentiam; ita tamen quod haeredes ipsos honorifice, pro quantitate haereditatis interim habant, et debita etiam defuncti pro quantitate haereditatis et temporis quo illis custodia deputetur, acquietent; unde et de debitibus antecessorum de jure respondere tenentur. Negotia quoque ipsorum haeredum agere possunt, et placita de jure cìs acquirendo movere et prosequi, si emissa

1 See above, p. 41. There was a distinction between wardship of the lands and wardship of the body. The lord was entitled to both except when the infant's father was still alive. In that case the father was entitled as against the lord to the wardship of the body. This carried with it the right to the marriage of the infant. See Littleton, lib. ii. c. 4. § 114.

2 The exact age seems not to have been quite settled in Bracton's time (see fol. 50), but in the time of Littleton was finally fixed at fourteen; lib. ii. c. 5. § 123. As to tenants in socage, see above, p. 45, sqq.

3 'But if he be the son of a burgage tenant he is held to be of full age as soon as he can keep correct accounts, measure cloth, and in similar matters transact his father's business. And thus the lord has the complete custody both of the persons of the sons and heirs of their tenants and also of their estates, so as to have complete power of disposing of both. As for instance, after the heirs have come under wardship, the lord is entitled to make grants of ecclesiastical benefices, and to have the marriage of the female wards, if any females have come under wardship, and to manage their affairs generally, in the same way as he is accustomed to manage his own.'

4 'In perpetuity.' The word is sometimes used by Glanvill to express 'estate of inheritance.'

5 Pleas, suits: placita coronae or criminalia are criminal suits as opposed CHAP. II. fuerit de aetate contra minorem exceptio. Respondere autem non tenetur pro illis nec de recto nec de disseisina nisi in unico casu.

Restituiere autem tenentur custodes haereditates ipse haeredibus instauratas et debitis acquietatas, juxta exigentiam temporis custodiae et quantitatis haereditatis. Si vero dubium fuerit utrum fuerint haeredes maioris an minores, tunc procul dubio domini tam haeredes quam haereditates in custodia habebant, donec actas rationabiliter probetur per legales homines de vicineto et per eorum sacramentum.

c. 10. Si vero plures habuerint dominos ipsi haeredes sub custodia constituti, capites eorum domini, id est, illi quibus ligeantiam debent, sicut de primis eorum foedis, eorum habebant custodiam; ita quod de caeteris foedis relevia et alia recta servitia dominis ipsorum foedorum facere tenentur. Et sic custodia eis per totum sub forma praescripta remanebit. Notandum tamen quod si quis in capite de domino rege tenere debet, tunc ejus custodia ad dominum regem plene pertinet, sive alios dominos habere debet ipse haeres sive non; quia dominus rex nullum habere potest parem multo minus superiorem. Verum tamen ratione burgogii tantum non praefertur dominus rex aliis in custodias. Si vero dominus rex aliquam custodiam aliqui commiserit, tunc distinguitur utrum ei custodiam pleno jure commiserit, ita quod nullum eum inde reddere compotum oporteat ad scaccarium, aut aliter. Si vero ita plene ei custodiam commiserit, tunc poterit ecclesias vacantes donare, et alia negotia sicut sua recte exercere.

to placita civilia or civil suits; communia placita, suits between subject and subject. Hence the Court of Common Pleas. See Magna Carta (John), c. 17; Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 299.

1. The lord may transact business in the place and on behalf of the heir, and institute and prosecute suits to protect his rights, if the adversary sets up the nonage of the minor as a defence. A lord is however not bound to make himself defendant in place of the heir except in a single instance, which Glanvill proceeds to mention.

2. But the guardian in chivalry was not obliged to account for the mesne profits.

3. See Magna Carta, c. 37; below, Chap. III. § 2.

4. See as to the grant or sale of wardship by the king, the provisions of Magna Carta (John), c. 4; below, Chap. III. § 2; and see Littleton, lib. ii. c. 4. § 116.

5. See further as to guardianship in chivalry, below, Chap. III. § 2.
(3) Guardianship in Socage.

Lib. vii. c. 11. Haeredes vero solemannorum, mortuis antecessoris suis, in custodia consanguineorum suorum propinquiorum erunt; ita tamen quod si haereditas ipsa ex parte patris descendit, ad consanguineos ex parte matris descendentes custodia ipsa referatur. Sin autem ex parte matris haereditas ipsa descendit, tunc ad consanguineos paternos custodia pertinet. Nuncum enim custodia alicujus de jure alicui remanet, de quo habeatur suspicio quod possit vel velit aliquod jus in ipsa haereditate clamare.\(^1\)

(4) Marriage of Female Tenants.

Lib. vii. c. 12. Mulier vero vel mulieres, si haeredes alicujus remanserint, in custodia dominorum suorum remanent. Quae, si infra aetatem fuerint, in custodia erunt, donec plenariam habent aetatem\(^2\); et cum habuerint aetatem, tenetur dominus eam eae maritare, singulas cum suis rationabilibus portionibus. Si vero maiores fuerint, tunc quoque in custodia dominorum suorum remanebunt, donec per consilium et dispositionem dominorum marshentur. Quia sine dominorum dispositione vel assensu, nulla mulier, haeres terrae, maritari potest de jure et consuetudine regni. Unde si quis filiam vel filias tantum habens haereditem illam vel illas in vita sua sine assensu domini sui maritaverit, inde justae secundum jus et consuetudinem regni perpetuo exhaereditatur, ita quod inde de caetero nihil recuperare poterit nisi per solam misericordiam; et hoc ea ratione, quia cum maritus ipsius mulieris haereditis alicujus homagium de tenemento illo facere tenetur ipsi domino, requirenda est ipsius domini ad id faciendum voluntas et assensus; ne de inimico suo, vel alio modo minus idonea personas, homagium de foedo suo cogatur recipere.\(^3\) Verum si quis licentiam

---

\(^1\) See as to the rights and duties of guardian in socage, Littleton, lib. ii. c. 5. § 123. When the heir arrives at the age of fourteen he may oust the guardian, and call upon him to render an account of the issues and profits of the land. If the guardian has provided the heir with a marriage, he is bound to account for the value of the marriage. Guardianship in socage exists at the present day, but a new power of appointing a guardian by the will of the father has been given by 12 Car. II, c. 24. s. 8. See below, Chap. IX.

\(^2\) This was fourteen, extended, so far as relates to the right of the lord to hinder a marriage, by the Statute of West. I, c. 22, to sixteen. Littleton, lib. ii. c. 4. § 103. See above, p. 41.

\(^3\) In Bracton's time this strictness was somewhat relaxed (fol. 88), and by the Statute of Merton, 20 Hen. III, cc. 6, 7 (below, Chap. III. § 3), a definite penalty was imposed.
CHAP. II. quaerit a domino suo filiam suam et haeredem alicui maritandi, tenetur dominus aut consentire, aut justam causam ostendere quare consentire non debet; aliter enim etiam contra ipsius voluntatem poterit mulier ipsa de consilio patris sui et pro voluntate libere maritari. . . . . .

Si semel legitime nuptiae fuerint, tunc, si viduae factae fuerint, postmodum non tenebuntur iterum sub custodia dominorum esse; licet teneantur assensum eorum requirere in se maritandis prae dicta ratione; nec etiam tunc per eum incontinentiam haeredi tatem amittent 1.

§ 5. Escheat and Forfeiture.

The law of escheat for failure of heirs remains in substance at the present day as it is stated in the following passage, the practical difference being that, as it is but comparatively seldom the case at the present day that freehold lands are held of any known mesne lord, escheat on failure of heirs of a freeholder usually is to the Crown as lord paramount.

Escheat was formerly divided under the heads of escheat propter defectum sanguinis (failure of heirs), and escheat propter delictum tenentis (for the felony of the tenant) 2; the latter kind of escheat however has, together with forfeiture for the same causes, been abolished by 33 and 34 Vict. c. 23.

Lib. vii. c. 17. Ultimi haeredes aliquorum sunt eorum domini 3. Cum quis ergo sine certo haerede moritur, quemadmodum sine filio, vel filia, vel sine tali haerede de quo dubium sit ipsum esse propinquorem haeredem et rectum, possunt et solent domini feodorum feoda illa tanquam escetas in manus suas capere et retinere; quicunque sint domini, sive rex, sive alius. Praeterea vero si quis veniens dicat se inde haeredem rectum, si per misericordiam domini sui, vel per praeceptum domini regis, hoc impetrare poterit, inde placitabit, et sic, si quod jus inde habuerit, diracionare poterit; ita tamen quod interim terra illa in manu domini feodi remaneat: quia quotienscunque dubitaverit aliquis

---

1 See Magna Carta, 1217, c. 8; below, Chap. III. § 4; and for more on the subject of 'marriage,' below, Chap. III. § 5.
2 See Blackstone, book ii. chap. 15.
3 As to whether title by escheat can properly be considered as falling under descent, see Blackstone, ii. p. 245.
ESCHEAT AND FORFEITURE.

dominus de haerede tenentis sui, utrum sit rectus haeres an non, CHAP. II.
terram illam tenere poterit, donec hoc ei legitime constiterit.

Idem quoque dictum est supra de haerede ubi dubium sit an sit major an minor; in hoc tamen est differentia, quod in uno caso intelligitur interim haereditas illa quasi escaeta ipsius domini; in alio vero caso, non intelligitur esse sua, nisi de custodia. Sin autem nullus appareat qui haereditatem ipsam tanquam haeres requisat, tunc ipsi domino remanet haereditas ipsa escaeta ad remanentiam; ita quod de illa disponere potest, sicut de sua propria, ad libitum suum. Praeterea si quae nuller, ut haeres alicujus in custodiam domini sui devenerit, si de corpore suo forisccecerit, haereditas sua domino suo pro delicto ipsius remanet escacta. Praeterea si quis de felonia convictus fuerit, vel confessus in curia, eo per jus regni exhaeredato, terra sua domino suo remanet escacta. Notandum quod si quis in capite de domino rege tenuerit, tunc tam terra quam omnes res mobiles sue, et catalla penes quemcumque inveniantur, ad opus domini regis capientur sine omni recuperatione alicujus haereditis. Sin autem de alio quam de rege tenuerit is qui utlagatus est 1, vel de felonia convictus, tunc quoque omnes res suae mobiles regis erunt. Terra quoque per unum annum remanebit in manu domini regis, elapso autem anno, terra cadem ad rectum dominum, scilicet ad ipsum de cujus foedus est, revertetur, veruntamen cum domorum subversione et arborum extirpatione. Et generaliter quotiescunque aliquis alicuius facerit vel dixerit in curia, propter quod per judicium curiae exhaereditatus fuerit, haereditas ejus ad dominum foedi de quo illa tenetur tanquam escacta solet reverti. Forisfactura autem fillii et haeredis alicuius patrem non exhaeredat neque fratrem, neque alium quam seipsum. Praeterea si de farto fuerit aliquis condemnatus, res ejus mobiles et omnia catalla sua vicecomiti provinciae remanere solet, terram autem, si qua fuerit, dominus foedi recuperabit statim, non expectato anno. Cum quis vero per legem terrae fuerit utlagatus, et postmodum beneficio principis paci restitutus, non poterit ea ratione haereditatem, si quam habuerit ille vel haeredes sui, versus dominum suum (nisi ex misericordia ipsius domini et benefici) recuperare; forisfacturam autem et utlagaram solet dominus rex damnatis remittere, nec tamen aliensa jura ideo quaeir infringere.

1 The law of forfeiture in the case of outlawry is not affected by the Statute 33 and 34 Vict. c. 25. See for process of outlawry, Blackstone, iii. 283.
§ 6. Descent of an Estate of Inheritance.

The great characteristic of a feodum in the second sense of the term as an estate of inheritance is its capacity of descending to heirs, whether lineal descendants or collaterals. We have not as yet arrived at the distinction between different estates of inheritance, between estates in fee simple and estates in fee tail. The following passage contains in outline a statement of the law of descent which prevailed till it was recast by the Inheritance Act of 1833 (3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 106). The law as to the descent of socage estates, as stated in this passage, though still traceable in Bracton, before long became obsolete, and the same rules as to descent prevailed in lands held in socage and by knight-service. The equal division of lands amongst all the sons only continued as a local custom in certain boroughs, and in the county of Kent, where it is still the rule. The point as to the respective rights of the younger son and a grandson (child of a predeceased elder son) was by Bracton’s time settled by the adoption of the general principle that the issue represents the ancestor in infinitum.

Lib. vii. c. 3. Haeredunt autem alii sunt proximi, alii sunt remotores; proximi haeredes alicujus sunt quos ex suo corpore procreaverit, ut filius vel filia. Quibus deficientibus vocantur haeredes remotores, scilicet nepos vel nepetis ex filio vel filia recta linea descendens, in infinitum. Item frater et soror, et ex illis ex transverso descendentes. Item avunculus, tam ex parte patris quam ex parte matris, et matertera similiter, et ex illis descendentes. Cum quis ergo haereditatem habens moriatur, si unicum filium haereditem habuerit, indistincte verum est quod filius ille patri suo succedit in toto. Si plures reliquerit filios, tunc distinctur utrum ille fuerit miles, sive per feodum militare tenens, aut liber sokemannis. Quis si miles fuerit, vel per militiam tenens, tunc secundum jus regni Angliae primogenitus filius patri succeddit in totum; ita quod nullus fratrum suorum partem inde

1 See above, p. 59.
2 See Bracton, 76 a.
3 See Bracton, 64 b.
4 Notice the influence of the phraseology of Roman law. This expression was properly applied to the action of the praetor. See Just. Inst. iii. 5.
5 There is no evidence as to the time when or the mode in which this change was introduced. See above, p. 46.
DESCENT OF AN ESTATE OF INHERITANCE.

85
de jure petere potest. Si vero fuerit liber sokemannis, tunc CHAP. II. quidem dividetur haereditas inter omnes filios, quotquot sunt, per partes aequales, si fuerit socagium illud antiquitus divisum, salvo tamen capitali mesuagio primogenito filio pro dignitate aesciae suae; ita tamen quod in alii rebus satisfaciet alii ad valentiam. Si vero non fuerit antiquitus divisum, tunc primogenitus secundum quorundam consuetudinem totam haereditatem obtinebit, secundum autem quorundam consuetudinem postnatus filius haeres est 1. Item si filiam tantum unam reliquerit quis haeredem, tunc id obtinet indistincte quod de filio dictum est. Sin autem plurae filiae, tunc quidem indistincte inter ipsas dividetur haereditas, sive fuerit miles, sive sokemannis pater earum; salvo tamen primogenitae filiae capitali mesuagio sub forma praescripta. Notandum autem quod si quis fratrum vel sororum, inter quos dividitur haereditas, sine haerede de corpore suo moriatur, tunc illa portio, quae defuncti erat, inter caeteros superstites dividetur. Maritus autem primogenitae filiae homagium faciat capitali domino de toto foedo. Tenetur autem postnatae filiae, vel earum mariti, servitium sumum de suo tenemento capitali domino facere per manum primogenitae vel ejus mariti. Nullum tamen homagium vel etiam fidelitatem aliquam tenetur mariti postnatarum filiarum marito primogenitae filiae inde facere in vita sua, nec earum haeredes primi vel secundi: tertiio vero haeredes ex postnatis filiabus execantes, secundum jus regni homagium tenentur facere de suo tenemento haeredi filiae primogenitae et rationabile relevium. Praeterea sciendum est quod maritii mulierum quarumcumque, nihil de haereditate uxorum suorum donare possunt sine consensu haeredum suorum, vel de jure ipsorum haeredum aliud remittere possunt nisi in vita sua 2. Si vero filium habuerit quis haeredem, et praeterea filiam habuerit vel filias, filius ipse succeedit in toto: unde contingit quod si quis plures habuerit uxores et ex qualibet filiam vel filias, extremo autem ex postrema unicum filium, ille filius solus obtinet haereditatem patris; quia generaliter verum est quod mulier nunquam cum masculo partem capiat in haereditate aliqua; nisi forte alius speciale fiat in aliqua civitate, et hoc per longam consuetudinem ejusdem civitatis. Si vero habuerit quis pluribus uxores et ex qualibet earum filiam vel filias, omnes filiae

1 As to borough English, see Blackstone, ii. 83; above, p. 47.
2 The husband by the marriage only acquires an estate in his wife’s lands during the joint lives of himself and his wife. This estate in certain events (death of wife having had issue born alive) is enlarged into an estate by the ‘curtesy’ of England (per legem Angliae), i.e. an estate for the husband’s own life. See below, Chap. III. § 16.
erunt pares ad haereditatem patris, eodem modo ac si omnes essent ex eadem mater. Cum quis autem moriatur sine haereditate filio vel filia, si habuerit nepotes vel nepotes ex filio vel filia, tunc quidem in alia successione sucede心动 ipsi eodem modo quo predeterminatum est supra de filio vel filiabus, et sub eadem distinctione. Illi enim qui recta linea descendunt, semper illis preferuntur qui ex transverso veniunt. Cum quis autem moriatur habens filium postnatum, et ex primogenito filio praemortuo nepotem, magna quidem juris dubitatio solet esse, utor illorum preferendus sit aliis in illa successione, scilicet utrum filius an nepos. Quidam enim dicere volebant filium postnatum rectorem esse haereditem quam nepotem talem, ea videlicet ratione, quia filius primogenitus cum mortem patris non expectaret nec expectavit quosque haeres ejus esset, et uta cum postnatus filius superviveret tam fratrem quam patrem, recte ut dicitur patri succedit. Alis vero visum est nepotem talem de jure avunculo suo esse praeferendum. Cum enim nepos ille ex filio primogenito exerit, et de corpore suo exsisterit haeres, in totum ipsius quod patrem suum, si adhuc viveret, haberet, ipse patri suo succedere debet. Ita dico si pater suus non fuerit ab avo suo forisfamilias, etc.

c. 4. Deficientibus autem hiis qui recta linea descendunt, tunc frater vel fratres succedant: aut si non reperiantur fratres, vocandae sunt sorores; quibus praemortuis corum liberi vocantur; post hos vero vocantur avunculi et corum liberi; postremo materterae vel curum liberi; habita et observata distinctione superior praemotata, inter filios milites et filios sokemannsi et nepotes similiter; habita quoque distinctione inter masculos et feminas.

c. 16. Quaeris potest de bastardo, qui nullum haereditem habere potest, nisi de corpore suo habuerit haereditem.

§ 7. Alienation.

The following passage shows that in Glanvill's time the conception that a tenant in fee simple might freely alienate

1 As to co-parceners, see below, Chap. V. § 5.
2 It does not appear that Glanvill is here referring to any known process of English law. Probably this expression arises from the association of the doctrines of Roman law with reference to the position of the emancipated son.
3 The Inheritance Act, 1833 (3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 106), has introduced the important alteration in the law of descent that next after lineal descendants the inheritance shall go to the nearest lineal ancestor. This has based the succession of collaterals on a new principle. They now take, not as before directly from the person last seised, but as representing the common ancestor.
ALIENATION. 87

his land had not been reached. He can only do so to a certain extent, and for certain purposes. But the restrictions upon alienation, with the exception of the prohibition of wills of land, were not of a feudal character; they are not, as was the case soon after the reign of Henry II, encroachments upon the freedom of the tenant devised by the selfishness and avarice of the lords. They are the relics of primitive custom antecedent to the growth of feudal ideas.

We have seen that though in Anglo-Saxon times freedom of alienation in the case of bookland was the general rule, this freedom was deemed to depend on the power conferred on the grantee by the charter; if there were no evidence of the grant of any such power, the property of the family could not be wholly alienated. This passage shows that traces of the old customary law prevailed in the time of Henry II. After this reign questions as to the right of alienation depend not on the duties of the freeholder towards his heir, but on his duties towards his lord. The distinction between the power of alienating the ancient inheritance of the family and the recent acquisition of the tenant is very characteristic of the history of alienation. It is very prominent in the customary law of France.

Liv. vii. c. r. In alia enim accipitores accipit valor secundum leges Romanas; secundum quas proprie appellatur dos, id quod cum muliere datur viro, quod vulgariter dicitur maritagium.

1 See below, Chap. III. § 14.
4 The property which by Teutonic custom was given by the father of the bride to the husband on her marriage was called faderiow or faderleum (father’s cattle; see above, p. 21, note). See Laws of Ethelbert, St; Thorpe, fol. ed., p. 10. As to the distinction between this gift and dowry, see below, Chap. III. § 4. As to maritagium, or frank-marriage, see Gisvill, lib. vii. c. 18. ‘Librum dicitur maritagium quando aliquis liber homo aliquam partem terrae suae dat cum aliqua muliere alieni in maritagium, ita quod ab omni servitio terra illa sit quies, et a se et haceditibus suis versus capitelem dominum acquietanda. Et in hac quidem libertate ita stabit terra CHAP. II. Potest itaque quilibet liber homo, terram habens, quandam partem terrae suae cum filia sua vel cum aliqua alia quilibet muliere, dare in maritigium, sive habuerit haeredem sive non; velit haeres, si habuerit haeredem, sive non velit; immo etiam co et contrario dicente et reclamante. Quilibet etiam, cuiunque voluerit, potest dare quandam partem sui liberis tenementi in remunerationem erserviti sui vel loco religioso in eleemosynam, ita quod si donationem ilam seizina fuerit secura, perpetuo remanebit illi cui donata fuerit terra illa et haereditas suis, si jure haereditario fuerit ei concessa. Si vero donationem talem nulla sequuta fuerit seizina, nihil post mortem donatoris ex tali donatione contra voluntatem haeredis efficaciter peti potest; quia id intelligitur secundum consuetudinem interpretationem potius esse nuda promissio quam alia vera promissio vel donatio. Licet autem ita generaliter cuilibet de terra sua rationabiliter partem pro sua voluntate, cuinquaque voluerit, libere in vita sua donare; in extremis tamen agenti non est cu quam haec tenus permissum; quia possit tunc immodica fieri haereditatis distributio, si fuisse locum permissum illi qui fervore passionis instantis et memoriam et rationem ammittit, quod non nunquam evenire solet; unde presumetur quod si quis in infirmitate positus ad mortem, distribuere cepisset terram suam, quod in sanitate sua minime facere voluisse, quod potius pro-veniret illud ex furore animi quam ex mentis deliberatione. Posset tamen hujusmodi donatio in ultima voluntate alicii facta ita tenere, si cum consensu haeredis fieret et ex suo consensu con-firmaretur. Cum quis autem de terra sua in maritigium vel alio illa usque ad tertium haeredem, nec interim tenebuntur haeredes inde facere aliquod homagiuni: post tertium vero haeredem ad debitum servitium terra ipsa revertetur et homagium inde capietur.—Cum quis itaque terram aliquam cum uxor sua in maritigium cepit, si ex uxor sua haeredem habuerit filium vel filiam clamantem et auditum, infra quatuor parietes, si idem vir uxorxi suam supervixerit, sive vixerit haeres sive non, illi in vita sua remanet maritigium illud, post mortem vero ipsius ad donatorem vel ejus haeredes est reversum. Sin autem ex uxorxi sua nunquam habuerit haeredem, tunc statim post mortem uxorxi ad donatorem vel haeredes ejus reverte-tur maritigium. 1 In laterum times estates in frank marriage came to be regarded as a particular kind of estates in special tall. See Coke upon Littleton, lib. l.

c. 2. § 17. As to dower, see below, Chap. III. § 4; and as to the husband’s life estate by the curtesy, ib. § 16.

1 For without livery of seizin no estate would have passed.
2 This restriction upon power of disposing of lands by will is a limitation of the usual freedom of alienation of privately-owned lands enjoyed before the Conquest.
 modo donat, aut habet haereditatem tantum, aut quemum tantum donat, aut haereditatem et questum. Si haereditatem tantum, poterit quidem ex eadem haereditate quandam partem donare, ut dictum est, cuilibet extraneo cuicumque voluerit. Si autem plures habuerit filios mulieratos, non poterit de facili praeter consensum haeredis sui filio suo postnato de haereditate sua quantamlibet partem donare: quia si hoc esset permittum, accideret inde frequens prius natorum filiorum exhaereditio, propter majorem patrum affectionem quam saepe erga postnatos filios suos habere solent. Sed numquid filio suo bastardo potest quis, filium et haeredem habens, de haereditate sua donare? Quod si verum est, tunc melioris conditionis est in hoc bastardus filius quam mulieratus postnatus; quod tamen verum est. Si vero questum tantum habuerit is qui partem terrae suae donare voluerit, tunc quidem hoc ei licet, sed non totum questum, quia non potest filium suum haeredem exhaeredere. Veruntamen si nullum haeredem filium vel filiam ex corpore suo procreaverit, poterit quidem ex questu suoi cuicumque voluerit quandam partem donare, sive totum questum haereditabiliter. Ita quod si inde seitis fuerit is cui donatio illa facta fuerit in vita donatoris, non poterit aliquis haeres re-motor donationem illam irritare. Potest itaque cuilibet sic totum questum donare in vita sua, sed nullum haeredem inde facere potest, neque collegium, neque aliquem hominem; quia solus Deus haeredem facere potest non homo. Sin autem et haeredita-tatem et questum habuerit; tunc indistincte verum est quod poterit de questu suo quantamlibet partem, sive totum, cuicumque voluerit donare, ad remanentiam, de haereditate vero sua nihilminus dare potest secundum quod praedictum est dum scilicet rationabiliter hoc fecerit. Sciendum autem quod si quis liberum habens socagium plures habuerit filios, qui omnes ad haereditatem aequaliter pro aequalibus proportionibus sunt admittendi, tunc indistincte verum est quod pater eorum nihil de haereditate vel de questu, si nullum habuerit haereditatem, aliqui filiorum, quod excedat rationabilem partem suam quae ei contingat de tota haered-ditate paterna, donare poterit. Sed tantum donare poterit de haereditate sua pater cuilibet filiorum suorum de libero socagio in vita sua, quantum jure successionis post mortem patris idem

1 The contrast is here between land inherited and land acquired by gift or purchase.
2 I. e. sons born in lawful wedlock.
3 'Corporation.' For the precise meaning of a corporation, see note on the Statute 7 Ed. I, Chap. IV, § 2.
CHAP. II. consequaturus esset de eadem haereditate. Veruntamen occasione liberalitatis quod patres in filios vel etiam in alios exercere solent, juris quidem questionis in hujusmodi donationibus saepius emergunt 1.

§ 8. A Fine of Lands,

The only direct way of conveying a freehold interest in lands from one person to another was by feoffment accompanied by livery of seisin. But a practice prevailed as early as the reign of Henry II of conveying lands by means of a fictitious or collusive suit, commenced by arrangement by the intended alience against the alienor, and then compromised with permission of the court by the defendant making his peace with the claimant and abandoning his defence. The whole transaction was then enrolled of record, and a document was drawn up, called in later times the foot, chirograph, or indenture of the fine, of which the following is a specimen. This operated as an assurance of lands binding upon all persons, whether parties or not, who did not within a given time, finally fixed (after having been extended indefinitely) at five years, put in their claim 2. The doctrine of fines was formerly one of the most intricate branches of the law of real property. As however this mode of dealing with land was entirely abolished by the Act for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries (3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 74), the subject belongs entirely to the antiquities of our law, and need not be discussed further.

Lib. viii. c. 1. Contingit autem multotiens loquelas motas in curia domini regis per amicabilem compositionem et finalem concordiam terminari, sed ex consensu et licentia domini regis, vel ejus justiciariorum, undecunque fuerit placitum, sive de terra sive de alia re. Solet autem plerumque concordia tali in communem

1 Glanvill proceeds to put the case of a gift of land by a father to one of four or more sons and the death of the donee without issue. Who is to succeed? Not the father, for it is a maxim that ‘nemo ejusdem tenementi simul potest esse haeres et dominus.’ The same reasoning excludes the elder sons. On this point he says, ‘Magna juris dubitatio et contentio in curia domini regis evemit vel evenire potest.’

2 Blackstone, ii. 354.
scripturam redigi et per communem assensum partium; et per CHAP. II.
illam scripturam coram justiciis domini regis in banco residenti-bus 1 recitari, et coram eis utrique parti, sua scriptura per omnia alii concordans, liberari: et erit sub hac forma facta:—

§ 8.

2. Haec est finalis concordia, facta in curia domini regis apud Westmonasterium in vigilia beati Petri Apostoli, anno regni Regis Henrici Secundi tricesimo tertio coram Ranulpho de Glanvilla justiciario domini regis, et coram H. R. W. et T. et aliis fidelidomini regis qui ibi tunc aderant, inter Priorem et Fratres Hospi-talis de Hierusalem, et W. T. filium Normanum et Alanum filium sum, quem ipse attornavit 2 in curia domini regis ad lucrandum et perdendum, de tota terra illa et de pertinentiis, excepta una bovata terrae et tribus toftis quas ipse W. tenuit: de qua terra tota (excepta praedita bovata et tribus toftis) placitum fuit inter eos in curia domini regis; sollicitet quod praedictus W. et Alanus concedunt et testantur donationem quam Normanus pater ipsius
W. ipsis inde fecit, et illam terram totam quietam clamavit de se et haeredibus suis domui Hospitalis et praefato Prioiri et Fratribus in perpetuum: excepta una bovata terrae praefata et exceptis tribus toftis quae remanent ipsi W. et Alan e et haeredibus suis, tenenda de domo Hospitali et praedicto Prioiri et Fratribus in perpetuum, et per liberum servitium quatuor denario rum per annum pro omni servitio: et pro hac concessione et testificatione et quieta clamantia praefatus Prior et Fratres Hospitalis dederunt ipsi Wilhelmo et Alan e centum solidos sterlingorum.

3. Et nota quod dicitur talis concordia finalis eo quod finem imponit negotio, adeo ut neuter litigantiam ab ea de caetero poterit recedere. Alterutro enim non tenente vel non faciente quod convenit, et altera partium inde se conquerente, praecipitur vicecomiti quod ponat eum per salvos plegiis quod sit coram justiciis domini regis inde responsurus quare finem illum non teneretur.

1 At this time the Curia Regis, sitting usually at Westminster, or where-ever the royal court happened to be. After Magna Carta (c. 17) the Court of Common Pleas was that in which fines, as well as all other real actions, took place.
2 'Made his attorney.' An attorney, or as he is called in lib. x. c. 18, 'responsals ad lucrandum vel perdendum,' was a person appointed by the suitor in open court to conduct the particular cause for him, upon which a writ issued to the sheriff commanding him to receive the person so appointed in the place of the principal.

A sketch of the history of the law of real property would not be complete without some notice of the remedies available for the ouster or dispossession of the freehold. The extracts given above (§ 2) are sufficient to show the nature of the supreme and final remedy by which a tenant in fee simple could assert his right, namely, by writ of right commenced either in the Curia Regis or the territorial court. The extreme complexity of the proceedings in the writ of right caused the adoption of other remedies, by which nothing was decided as to the question of the right of property, but merely that the one party had a right as against the other to the actual seisin or possession of the lands.

By seisin is meant, as has already been pointed out, possession as of freehold, that is the possession which a freeholder could assert and maintain by appeal to law. There was in fact no other kind of legal possession known at this early time. In later times the word seisin comes to be distinct from possession, the latter being applicable to the possession of a leaseholder or copyholder, the former being confined to the possession of a freeholder. It should however be observed that it was by no means necessary for a person to be seised as of right. There was a seisin as of right, and a seisin as of wrong. If the rightful freeholder was ousted and in fact lost his possession, he was disseised or put out of seisin, and the wrongdoer or disseisor was seised in his place, holding by wrong the estate from which he had ousted the rightful possessor. He had in fact a 'defeasible title'¹, and for many purposes acts done by him held good as if he had been rightfully seised. A person so seised by wrong was of course liable to be turned out by the rightful owner either by actual entry upon him, or by process of law. A complicated system of rules grew up as to the circumstances and conditions under which this right of actual entry existed, when it ceased, and when the only remedy was by calling in aid the action of the tribunals. The refinements arising on this part of the law it will not be necessary to discuss.

¹ Coke upon Littleton, § 8 b.

In the great majority of cases when litigation arose as to the right to land, it would be sufficient to decide which of the two litigants had the right of immediate actual possession; or rather, whether the plaintiff could make out a right to the possession as against the person actually in possession. It was comparatively seldom necessary to have recourse to the higher remedy of a writ of right in order to decide which of the two had the greater right to the land. These possessory actions, as the former class were called, must be brought within a fixed period, and different limits were from time to time assigned.\(^1\)

The writ of assize of Mort d’Ancestor was perhaps\(^2\) instituted by the ordinance called the Assize of Northampton, A.D. 1176, and was applicable only to the particular case where, upon the death of the demandant’s father or mother, brother or sister, uncle or aunt, nephew or niece, some person other than the lawful heir had entered upon the land. If the demandant could prove that the ancestor died seised ‘in his demesne as of fee,’ and that he (the demandant) was the right heir, the result

---

1 See as to different periods of limitation, Hale’s History of the Common Law, p. 122.

2 Cap. 4. ‘Item si quis obierit francus-tenens, haeredes ipsius remaneant in tali saisina qualem pater suus habitu die qua fuit vivus et mortuus de foedo suo; et catalla sua habeant unde faciant deviaam defuncti: et dominum suum postea requirant, et ei faciant de relevio et alios quae ei facere debent de foedo suo. Et si haeres fuerit infra actualsem, dominus foedi recipiat homagium suum et habeat in custodia illum quandiu debuerit. Alii dominii, si duas fuerint, homagium eis recipiat, et ipsae faciat eis quod facere debuerit. Et uxor defuncti habeat domen suam et partem de catallis ejus quae eam contingat. Et si dominus foedi negat haeredibus defuncti saisinam ejusdem defuncti quam exigunt, justitiae domini regis faciant inde fieri recognitionem per duodecim legales homines, qualcum saisinam defunctus inde habuit die qua fuit vivus et mortuus; et sicut recognitum fuerit, ipsa haeredibus ejus restituant. Et si quis contra hoc fecerit et inde attaindus fuerit, remaneat in misericordia regis.’ (Stubbs’ Select Charters, p. 151.)
CHAP. II. of the decision of these points in his favour would be the establishment of the right of the demandant to the possession as against the tenant. Similar writs, varied in form to suit the circumstances, and called by different names, were used for the recovery of the possession by a person claiming as heir of a more distant relation. It will be seen from the form of the writ that this proceeding would not be applicable when lands had been devised by will, and therefore after the statutes conferring the power of devising lands by will this remedy was no longer available.

The Assize of novel disseisin was applicable where the demandant himself had been turned out of possession. The material points necessary for him to establish appear from the following writ. If successful, the demandant would in this proceeding recover his possession, and also damages for the injury sustained.

This was the usual remedy for the recovery of the possession of lands. In certain cases which need not be here specified, it was necessary to resort to the writ of right. But as a rule all practical purposes were attained by means of one of the forms of action adapted to trying the right of possession.

The remedy by the assizes of mort d'ancestor and novel disseisin was only applicable in particular cases. The remedy for the recovery of possession, applicable to all cases, whether falling under the two classes just mentioned or not, was the writ of entry. The law on this subject (now obsolete) is of far too intricate and complicated a character to be discussed here. The remedy by assise was preferred when applicable, as being more expeditious. In later times both the older

1 See Blackstone, iii. p. 187.
2 This is also referred to in the Assize of Northampton, cap. 5: ‘Item justitiae domini regis faciant fieri recognititionem de dissaisinis factis super assisam, a tempore quo dominus rex venit in Angliam proximo post pacem factam inter ipsum et regem filium suum.’ (Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 152.)
3 See Blackstone's account of the Assize of Novel Dissaisin, iii. p. 187.
4 See Blackstone's sketch of the Writ of Entry, iii. p. 180, &c.
proprietary and possessory remedies, or real actions as they were called, were superseded by the action of ejectment, the history of which is noticed below. After having long fallen into disuse, these real actions were abolished by 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 27, sec. 36.

Lib. xiii. c. 1. Generalia quae circa praemissa placita de recto frequentius in curia contingunt hactenus in parte sunt expedita. Nunc vero ea quae super seizinis solummodo usitata sunt restant prosequenda: quae quis ex beneficio constitutionis regni quae Assisa nominatur in majori parte transigi solet per recognitionem, de diversis recognitionibus restat tractandum.

c. 2. Est autem quaedam recognitio quae vocatur de morte antecessoris. Cum quis itaque moritur seinitus de aliquo libero tenemento, ita quod inde fuerit seinitus in dominico suo sicut de feodo suo, haeres eandem seisinam antecessoris sui recte petere potest, et si major fuerit habebit tale breve:

>c. 3. Rex Vicecomiti salutem. Si G. filius T. fecerit te securn de clamore suo prosequendo, tunc summone per bonos summmonores duodecim liberos et legales homines de vicineto de illa villa, quod sint coram me vel justiciis meis ea die parati sacramento recognoscere, si T. pater praedicti G. fuit seinitus in dominico suo sicut de feodo suo de una virgata terrae in illa villa die qua obiit; si obiit post primam coronationem meam, et si ille G. propinquior haeres ejus est, et interim terram illam videant, et nomina eorum imprehendi factas, et summone per bonos summmonores R. qui terram illam tenet, quod tunc sit ibi auditerus illam recognoscon. Et habebas ibi summmonores etc.

2 See Chap. III. § 17.
3 This probably refers to the ordinance mentioned in Glanvill, ii. 7 (see above, § 2), which introduced the practice of referring the decision on a writ of right to the oaths of twelve men properly chosen, instead of deciding it by battle. This mode of trial per recognitionem seems by the same ordinance to have been extended to questions of possession. From the practice of trial per recognitionem arose trial by jury in civil cases.
4 'In his demesne as of fee'; the proper technical expression for an estate of fee simple in possession.
5 The jury consist of neighbours who are assumed to know themselves or to have heard from others the true facts of the case and to be prepared to state them truly upon their oaths. The notion that the jury are to hear evidence and give the verdict in accordance with the evidence is of later growth.
c. 32. Postremo de illa recognitione quae appellantur de nova disseisina restat dicendum. Cum quis itaque infra assisam domini regis, id est infra tempus a domino rege de consilio procerum ad hoc constitutum, quod quandoque majus quandoque minus cense tur, alium injuste et sine judicio disseisiverit de libero tenemento suo, disseisito hujus constitutionis beneficio subvenitur, et tale breve habebit:

c. 33. Rex Vicecomiti salutem. Questus est mihi N. quod R. injuste et sine judicio disseisivit eum de libero tenemento suo in illa villa, post ultimam transfretationem meam in Normaliam. Et ideo tibi praecipio quod si praefatus N. fecerit te securum de clamore suo prosequendo, tunc facias tenementum illud reseisci de catallis quae in eo captae fuerunt, et ipsum cum catallis esse facias in pace usque ad clausum Paschae, et interim facias duodecim liberos et legales homines de vicineto videre terram illam et nomina eorum imbreviari facias: et summone illos per bonos summoneores quod tunc sint coram me vel justiciis meis parati inde facere recognitionem. Et pone per vadium et salvos plegios praedictum R. vel ballivum suum, si ipse non fuerit inventus, quod tunc sit ibi auditurus illam recognitionem.

c. 34. Brevia autem de nova disseisina diversis modis variantur secundum diversitatem tenementorum in quibus fuerint disseisinae. Si autem aut levetur fossatum aliquid aut prosternetur, aut si exaltetur stagnum aliquis molendini, infra assisam Domini Regis, ad nocum tenementi liberos et aliquis, secundum haec brevia variantur in hunc modum.

c. 37. Praeterea si facta fuerit disseisina in communia pasturae tunc breve tale erit. Rex Vicecomiti salutem: Questus est mihi N. quod R. injuste et sine judicio disseisivit eum de communi pastura sua in illa villa, quae pertinet ad liberum tenementum suum in eadem villa, vel in illa alia villa, post ultimam transfretationem meam in Normaliam. Et ideo tibi praecipio quod si praefatus N. fecerit te securum de clamore suo prosequendo tunc facias duodecim liberos etc. videre pasturam illam et tenementum et nomina eorum, etc.

1 See above, p. 93.
2 As to common of pasture, see below, Chap. III. § 18 (2).
CHAPTER III.

STATE OF THE LAW FROM THE END OF THE REIGN OF HENRY II TO THE END OF THE REIGN OF HENRY III.

In the period treated of in this Chapter we find the law of England falls into two great divisions, in respect of the modes in which it originates, namely, Statute Law, or law resting on express legislative enactment, and Common Law, or that portion of the law of the country which does not rest on express legislative enactment.

The Statute Book commences with Magna Carta, or rather with the third reissue in the ninth year of Henry III of the Charter granted by John. Although the later constitution of the legislature was not yet developed, Magna Carta and the other statutes of the reign of Henry III are of equal authority with any Act passed by Parliament after its full constitution was completed.

The field of Statute Law is at first confined and narrow. It chiefly consists in an authoritative declaration of rules which had previously existed as rules of law or custom, together with an amendment of them in some particulars. Of this character mainly are the enactments affecting private law\(^1\) contained in Magna Carta.

\(^1\) For the distinction between private and public law see Appendix to Part I, Table i.
With the rise of Statute Law the opposition between Common Law and Statute Law comes into prominence. We have not yet arrived at the time when the opposition between Common Law and Equity has begun. This double opposition has given an ambiguity to the expression 'Common Law.' As opposed to Statute Law, Common Law simply means law which is independent of legislative enactment: that is to say, a rule of Common Law is either a rule as it stood before some definite change was wrought in it by statute, or a rule of existing law recognised and acted upon by the courts but not resting on any statute. It is plain that the great bulk of the rules of law prevailing at the period in question consisted of rules of Common Law. The sources of our knowledge of the Common Law from this time forward consist of (1) judicial records, including the forms of the writs by which actions were commenced, and reports of decisions; (2) authoritative text-books.

(1) Judicial records. Now that the jurisdiction of the royal Court in suits relating to the freehold was thoroughly established, and was exercised either by the Court fixed since Magna Carta at Westminster, or by the itinerant judges sent to hold pleas throughout the country, a practice had arisen of keeping accessible records of the various cases brought before the superior tribunals. These records usually contain an abstract of the writ, or formal statement of the cause of action, which issued out of the Chancery under the king's seal. Some specimens of these writs preserved by Glanvill have been already given. As a rule they followed certain stereotyped forms, the judges refused to admit the validity of writs for which no precedent could be found. We find instances of new writs being introduced by the authority of the legislature, and some improvements and

1 For the meanings of Common Law see above, p. 64, note 2.
2 c. 17. Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 299.
3 See above, p. 65.
4 See the new writ given by the authority of the Council for the protection of the leaseholder, below, § 17, and the forms of writs provided by the Statute de Donis, below, Chap. IV. § 3. modifications of the old forms of action doubtless from time to time obtained recognition. By the Statute of Westminster II an attempt was made to extend the power of framing new writs; this however was long confined within narrow limits, and did not produce the intended result of providing a legal remedy wherever experience had shown a real need of one.
Strictly speaking, therefore, writs considered as a source of the Common Law may be referred either to Statute Law or to Judiciary Law, inasmuch as they derived their validity either from some express provision of the legislature, or from the fact of their recognition by the tribunals.

The decisions of the tribunals therefore now become the most important of the sources of law. Formal records are kept and studied, and a decision of a judge, especially if he be a man of weight, is treated as a precedent and followed in a similar case by another. Thus we constantly find in Bracton judicial decisions quoted as authorities for particular propositions. Traces of the same practice are found in Glanvill.
Records of cases adjudicated upon from the time of Richard I are in existence, and have been published amongst the documents issued by the Record Commission. From this time forward the recorded decisions of the regular tribunals are looked to as authoritative statements of the law. And as from time to time new cases arise, calling for a new rule or a deduction from an old rule for which there is no precedent, the decisions of the tribunals come to constitute in the 1 See the material part of this enactment given below, Chap. VI.

2 See instances below, and Finlason’s note on Reeves’ Hist. of English Law, p. 300.
3 The first publication was in 1811, under the name of Placitorum Ab-breviatio. The collection edited by Sir F. Palgrave in 1835, and called Rotuli Curiae Regis, is more copious, and begins in the sixth year of Richard I.
Mr. Bigelow of Boston, Massachusetts (‘Placita Anglo-Normanica,’ London, 1879), has collected various references to litigated cases to be found in historical records between the time of the Norman Conquest and Richard I.
These are interesting as illustrating the gradual growth of technical procedure and legal forms, and appear in marked contrast with the regularity of the proceedings which seem to date from the reign of Henry II.
strictest sense of the term a source or cause of law. Judge-made or judiciary law\(^1\) henceforth gradually displaces customary law.

(2) Authoritative text-books. Already in the time of Henry II the law had attained such a degree of uniformity throughout the country that a book was published with some claims to be called a systematic treatise on the law. Glanvill however rather presupposes the existence of a body of law than gives a complete exposition of it. It is a treatise rather on procedure than on the principles and rules of law which that procedure enforces. After Glanvill’s time the elaboration of the law as a system proceeded with rapid strides. In the reign of Henry III the treatise of Henricus de Bracton was composed\(^2\).
It purports to be a systematic exposition of the whole of English law, designed for the use of students and of judges.
A great portion of the matter of the work is based on the sources of Roman law, or on the works of commentators\(^3\).
There can be little doubt that at the time at which Bracton wrote a large amount of Roman law had been imported into the English system chiefly through the medium of clerical judges\(^4\). The jealousy so prevalent in later times between the common lawyers and the civilians had not yet arisen, and the newly appreciated treasures of the Roman law were doubtless frequently resorted to to supply both matter and form for \(^1\) For the characteristics of judiciary law see Austin on Jurisprudence, lect.

xxvii.

\(^2\) Little is known of Bracton’s life. He appears from entries in the Placitorum Abbreviatio to have served as an itinerant justice in Devonshire in 1246, 1251, and 1255. He also appears to have been an ecclesiastic, and there is a tradition that he was Archdeacon of Barnstaple. See Foss, Judges in the Rolls Series, pp. x-xii.

\(^3\) Especially Azo. See a short treatise, ‘Henricus de Bracton und sein Verhältnisse zum Römischen Rechte,’ by Dr. Carl Gütterbock, Berlin, 1862, translated by Brinton Core, Philadelphia, 1866; Introduction by Sir T. Twiss, p. xxxiv.

\(^4\) Amongst the judges mentioned by Bracton are Martinus de Patashull, Dean of St. Paul’s; W. Raleigh, clericus; the Abbot of Reading; and the Bishops of Durham, Chester, and Carlisle. Gütterbock, p. 27; Twiss, p. xxxvi.
the decisions of an English judge. Thus in incorporating a large portion of Roman law Bracton followed what was probably the prevailing tendency of the time. His work bears throughout traces of the influence of Roman law. Sometimes he inserts (not always appropriately) passages of the Institutes, Digest, or Code of Justinian; more often the form of the passage is slightly altered, but the substance remains. In arrangement and in phraseology, in casual words and turns of expression, the debt to the Roman lawyers is everywhere apparent. This is however less conspicuous in the extracts given below, relating to the law of land, than in most of the remainder of his work. The very different juristic conceptions prevailing in this branch of the law, which were due to feudalism, did not admit of any thorough application of the rules of Roman law. Many instances however will be found in the following extracts from Bracton of the application to English law of conceptions and terms borrowed from the Roman.

SECTION I.

EXTRACTS FROM STATUTES.

Magna Carta.

The edition of Magna Carta with which most editions of the Statutes commence is that issued in the ninth year of Henry III, A.D. 1225. The Charter was first issued by John in 1215: it was reissued in the first year of Henry III, 1216; again in 1217; and again in 1225. There are variations, in some cases of some importance, between the different editions. The following extracts contain the principal provisions of the Charter bearing upon the private law of land. It will be seen that the statute law of the reigns of John, Henry III, and Edward I is characterised throughout by marks of the influence of the great lords (domini capitales). It was the interest of these great tenants in capite at once to restrict the oppressive rights of the Crown (and to that extent no doubt the inferior tenants participated in the benefit of the legislation), and also to protect and enhance the rights of lords of manors as against their tenants. The former characteristic is conspicuous in the following provisions of Magna Carta, the latter in the statutes of Merton, De Religioso, De Donis, and Quia Emptores.

1 See Güterbock, p. 37.

§ 1. Reliefs.

The following provisions fix the amount due by way of relief on the succession of the heir of the tenant, and the conditions under which it is to be exacted.

Magna Carta (John, A.D. 1215), c. ii. *Si quis comitum vel baronum nostrorum, sive aliorum tenentium de nobis in capite per servitium militare, mortuus fuerit, et, cum decesserit, haeres suus plenae actatis fuerit et relevium debeat, habeat haereditatem suam per antiquum relevium; sic licet haeres vel haeredes comitis de baronia comitis integra per centum libras; haeres vel haeredes militis de feodo militis integro per centum solidos ad plus; et qui minus debuerit minus det secundum antiquam consuetudinem feodorum.

c. iii. Si autem haeres alicujus talium fuerit infra aetatem et fuerit in custodia, cum ad aetatem pervenerit, habeat haereditatem suam sine relevio et sine fine.

In the first charter of Henry III issued in 1216 and in the subsequent editions the latter article appears with the following addition:—

c. iii. Si autem haeres alicujus talium fuerit infra aetatem, dominus ejus non habeat custodiam ejus nec terrae suae, antequam homagium ejus ceperit; et postquam talis haeres fuerit in custodia, cum ad aetatem pervenerit, sic licet viginti unus anni, habeat haereditatem suam sine relevio et sine fine, ita tamen quod si ipse, dum infra aetatem fuerit, fiat miles, nihilominus terra remaneat in custodia domini sui usque ad terminum praedictum.

---

1 As to reliefs, see above, pp. 39, 76.
TRANSLATION\(^1\).

C. ii. If any of our earls or barons, or any other which hold of us in chief by knight's service, die, and at the time of his death his heir be of full age, and oweth to us relief, he shall have his inheritance by the old relief; that is to say, the heir or heirs of an earl, for a whole earldom, by one hundred pound\(^2\); the heir or heirs of a baron, for a whole barony, by one hundred marks; the heir or heirs of a knight for one whole knight's fee, one hundred shillings at the most; and he that hath less shall give less, according to the old custom of the fees.

C. iii. But if the heir of any such be within age, his lord shall not have the ward of him, nor of his land, before that he hath taken of him homage; and after that such an heir hath been in ward, when he is come to full age, that is to say, to the age of one and twenty years, he shall have his inheritance without relief and without fine; so that if such an heir, being within age, be made knight, yet nevertheless his land shall remain in the keeping of his lord unto the term aforesaid.

\(\text{§ 2. Guardian and Ward}^3\).

MAGNA CARTA (1215), c. iv. Custos terrae hujusmodi haeredis qui infra aetatem fuerit, non capiat de terra haeredis nisi rationabiles exitus, et rationabiles consuetudines, et rationabilia servititia, et hoc sine destructione et vasto hominum vel rerum; et si nos commiserimus custodiam alicujus talis terrae vicecomiti vel alicui alii qui de exitibus illius nobis respondere debet, et ille destructionem de custodia fecerit vel vastum, nos ab illo capiemus emendam, et terra committedur duobus legalibus et discretis hominibus de feodo illo, qui de exitibus respondent nobis, vel ei cui eos assignaverimus; et si dederimus vel vendiderimus alicui custodiam alicujus talis terrae, et ille destructionem inde fecerit vel vastum, amittat ipsum custodiam, et tradatur duobus legalibus et discretis hominibus de feodo illo, qui similiter nobis respondant, sicut praedictum est.

\(^1\) The translations of the statutes given in this Chapter and in Chapter IV are taken from the Statutes of the Realm.

\(^2\) The translation, which is that of the 'Insequenti' of the Charter of 1225 in 25 Ed. I, is from the text 'haeres vel haeredes comitis de comitatu integro per centum libras, haeres vel haeredes baronis de baronia integra per centum marcas' etc.

\(^3\) See above, pp. 41, 78.
CH. III. sect. I. § 2. Custos autem, quandiu custodiam terrae habuerit, sustentet domos, parcos, vivaria, stagna, molendina, et cetera ad terram illam pertinentia, de exitibus terrae ejusdem; et reddat haeredi, cum ad plenam aetatem pervenerit, terram suam totam instauratam de carrucis et waunagiis secundum quod tempus waunagii exiget et exitus terrae rationabiler poterunt sustinere.

In the charter of 1216 are added the words—et omnibus aliis rebus ad minus secundum quod illam recepit. Haec omnia observat ventur de custodis archiepiscopatum, episcopatum, abbatiam, prioratum, ecclesiariam et dignitatum vacantium, excepto quod custodiae huysmodi vendi non debent.

c. xxxvii. Si aliquis tenet de nobis per feudifirma, vel per socagium, vel per burgagium, et de alio terram tenet per servitium militare, nec non habeimus custodiam haeredis nec terrae suae quae est de feodo alterius, occasione illius feudifirmae, vel socagii, vel burgagii; nec habeimus custodiam illius feudifirmae, vel socagii, vel burgagii, nisi ipsa feudifirma debeat servitium militare. Nos non habeimus custodiam haeredis vel terrae aliujus, quam tenet de alio per servitium militare, occasione aliquijus parvae sergentii quam tenet de nobis per servitium reddendi nobis cultellos, vel sagittas, vel huysmodi.

TRANSLATION.

c. iv. The keeper of the land of such an heir, being within age, shall not take of the lands of the heir but reasonable issues, reasonable customs, and reasonable services, and that without destruction and waste of his men and his goods. And if we commit the custody of any such land to the sheriff, or to any other which is answerable unto us for the issues of the same land, and he make destruction or waste of those things that he hath in custody, we will take of him amends and recompense thereof, and the land shall be committed

1 By 3 Edward I, cap. 48, it is provided that if the guardian make a feoffment of the land the heir can recover against both guardian and feoffee by assise of novel disseisin, and the guardian shall lose the custody of the land. If the guardian be other than the chief lord, he is besides to be ‘grievously punished by the king’ (et en greve peine denvers le roi).

2 See these provisions re-enacted 3 Edward I, cap. 21.

3 ‘Fee farm,’ that is, where a rent is reserved to the granter in perpetuity out of the fee simple when it is granted away. See Butler’s note (f) to Coke upon Littleton, 143 b, and Blackstone, ii. 43.

4 As to petit serjeanty see above, p. 48.
to two lawful and discreet men of that fee, which shall answer unto us for the issues of the same land, or unto him whom we will assign. And if we give or sell to any man the custody of any such land, and he therein do make destruction or waste, he shall lose the same custody; and it shall be assigned to two lawful and discreet men of that fee, which also in like manner shall be answerable to us as afore is said.

c. v. The keeper, so long as he hath the custody of the land of such an heir, shall keep up the houses, parks, warrens, ponds, mills, and other things pertaining to the said land, with the issues of the said land; and he shall deliver to the heir, when he cometh to his full age, all his lands stored with ploughs, and all other things, at the least as he received it. All these things shall be observed in the custodies of Archbishopricks, Bishopricks, Abbeys, Priories, Churches, and Dignities vacant, which appertain to us, except this that such custody shall not be sold.

c. xxxvii. If any do hold of us by fee-ferm, or by socage, or burgage, and he holdeth lands of another by knight’s service, we will not have the custody of his heir, nor of his land, which is held of the fee of another, by reason of that fee-ferm, socage or burgage; neither will we have the custody of such fee-ferm, or socage, or burgage, except knight’s service be due to us out of the same fee-ferm. We will not have the custody of the heir, or of any land, by occasion of any petit serjeanty, that any man holdeth of us by service to pay a knife, an arrow, or the like.

§ 3. Marriage.

It has already been seen that in the time of Henry II the right of the lord to dispose of his tenant in marriage applied only to female tenants. Glanvill does not speak of this right as a source of profit to the lord, but merely as a security against the lord being obliged to receive the homage of a hostile or unfriendly tenant. That this was the origin of the practice appears clearly from the charter of Henry I; nor could the lord arbitrarily refuse his consent, much less force his female tenant to marry against her will. In course of time, rights which were formerly based on purely feudal

1 See above, Chap. II. § 3 (4).  2 See above, p. 41, note 4.
principles were retained in an exaggerated form merely because they became a source of profit to the lord. In this case the right to give consent to the marriage of a female tenant developed into the right to tender a suitable match, not only to the female tenant, but also to the male tenant if under age, a claim for which no feudal justification existed, and which was based simply on a strained construction of the general word 'haeredes' in the following section of Magna Carta. It was held that this expression applied to male as well as female heirs, and gave the lord the right to the marriage of the one as well as the other. The penalty by which the lord's rights were enforced was finally fixed by the subjoined provision of the Statute of Merton.

Magna Carta (1215), c. vi. Haeredes maritentur absque disparagacione, ita tamen quod, antequam contrahatur matrimonium, ostendatur propinquis de consanguinitate ipsius haeredis.

Statute of Merton, 20 Hen. III, c. vi. De haeredibus per parentes vel per alios vi abductis vel detentis, ita provisum est; quod quicunque laicos inde convictus fuerit quod puerum sic maritaverit, reddat perdenti valorem maritagii, et pro delicto corpus ejus capiatur et imprisonetur, donec perdenti emendaverit delictum, si puer maritetur, et praeterea donec domino regi satisfecerit pro transgressione; et hoc fiat de haerede infra quatuordecim annos existente. De haerede autem cum sit quatuordecim annorum vel ultra, usque ad plenam actatem, si se maritaverit sine licentia domini sui, ut ci auferat maritagium suum, et dominus offerat ei rationabile maritagium ubi non disparagetur, dominus suus tunc tenet terram ejus ultra terminum actatis suae, salicet viginti et unius anni, per tantum tempus quod possit. in duodecim valorem maritagii recipere secundum aestimationem legalem hominum, vel secundum quod ei pro eodem maritagio prius fuerit oblatum sine fraude et malitia, et secundum quod probari poterit in curia domini regis.

De dominis qui maritaverint illos quos habent in custodia villanis

1 See Blackstone, ii. p. 71.
2 This proviso is somewhat significantly omitted in the Charter of 1216 and subsequent editions.
3 Notice the extension to males.
vel alii sicut burgensibus ubi disparagentur; si talis haeres facta infra quattuordecim annos, et talis actatis quod consentire non possit, tunc si parentes conquerantur, dominus illis amittat custodial usque ad legitimam actatem haeredis; et omne commodum, quod inde perceptum fuerit, convertatur in commodum ipsius qui infra actatem est, secundum dispositionem et provisionem parentum, contra dedecus ei factum. Si autem fuerit quattuordecim annorum et ultra, quod consentire poterit, et tali maritatio consentierit, nulla sequatur poena.

CH. III.
SECT. i.
§ 3.
c. vii. Si quis haeres cujusunque fuerit actatis pro domino suo se noluerit maritare, non compellatur hoc facere, sed cum ad actatem pervenerit, det domino suo et satisfaciat ei de tanto, quantum perceperit posset ab aliquo pro maritatio, antequam terram suam recipiat, et hoc sive voluerit se maritare sive non; quia maritatum ejus qui infra actatem est nemo jure pertinent ad dominum feodi. ¹

MAGNA CARTA, c. vi. Heirs shall be married without disparagement.

STATUTE OF MERTON, c. vi. Of heirs that be led away, and withholden, or married by their parents, or by other, with force, against our peace, thus it is provided; That whatsoever layman be convict thereof that he hath so withholden any child, led away, or married, he shall yield to the loser the value of the marriage; and for the offence his body shall be taken and imprisoned until he hath recompensed the loser, if the child be married; and further until he hath satisfied the king for the trespass; and this must be done of an heir being within the age of fourteen years. And touching an heir being fourteen years old or above, unto his full age, if he marry without licence of his lord to defraud him of the marriage, and his lord offer him reasonable and convenient marriage, without disparagement, then his lord shall hold his land beyond the term of his age, that is to say, of one and twenty years, so long that he may receive the double value of the marriage, after the estimation of lawful men, or after as it hath been offered him for the said marriage before, without fraud or collusion, and after as it may be proved in the King’s Court. And as touching lords which marry those that they have in ward to villains, or other, as burgesses, where they be disparaged, if any such an heir be within the age of fourteen years, and of such age that he cannot consent to marriage, then if his friends complain of the same lord, the lord shall lose the wardship unto the age of the heir, and all the profit that thereof shall be taken shall be converted to the use of the heir being within age, after the disposition and provision of his friends, for the shame done to him; but if he be fourteen years and above, so that he may consent, and do consent to such marriage, no pain shall follow.

¹ See the Statute 3 Ed. I, cap. 22, by which these provisions of the Statute of Merton are re-enacted and extended.

c. vii. If an heir, of what age soever he be, will not marry at the request of his lord, he shall not be compelled thereunto; but when he cometh to full age, he shall give to his lord and pay him as much as any would have given him for the marriage, before the receipt of his land, and that whether he will marry himself, or not; for the marriage of him that is within age of mere right pertaineth to the lord of the fee.

§ 4. Widow’s Dower.

The additional provision made in the edition of 1217 to the provisions of the earlier issues of the Charter in respect of widows’ rights fixed the law of dower on the basis on which it still rests. The general rule of law still is that the widow is entitled for her life to a third part of the lands of which her husband was seised for an estate of inheritance at any time during the marriage. At the present day there are means provided which are almost universally adopted, of barring or defeating the widow’s claim. The general rule of law however remains the same.

The history of the law of dower deserves a short notice, which may conveniently find a place here. It seems to be in outline as follows. Tacitus noticed the contrast of Teutonic custom and Roman law, in that it was not the wife who conferred a dowry on the husband, but the husband on the wife. By early Teutonic custom, besides the bride-price, or

1 See 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 105.
2 ‘Dotes non uxor marito, sed maritus uxori offerit.’ Tac. Germ. c. 18.
Dos in the Roman sense was represented by the ‘fader-fish,’ or gift by the price paid by the intending husband to the family of the bride, it seems to have been usual for the husband to make gifts of land or chattels to the bride herself. These appear to have taken two forms. In some cases the husband or his father executed before marriage an instrument called 'libellum dotis,' specifying the nature and extent of the property to be given to the wife. Many forms of this instrument are preserved. The gift is sometimes made to the wife upon condition that if there is no issue of the marriage the property is to return to the heirs of the husband, sometimes the full property is vested in the wife. Another and apparently among the Anglo-Saxons a commoner form of dower is the 'morning-gift.' This was the gift which on the morning following the wedding the husband gave to the wife, and might consist either of land or chattels. It seems probable that in early times, if there was nothing in the form of gift to the contrary, the wife might, notwithstanding the marriage, alienate the property so given to her. This power of disposing of the dower, if it existed, had ceased in Glanvill's time. By the law as stated by Glanvill the man was bound to endow the woman tempore desponsationis ad ostium ecclesiae. The dower might be specified or not. If not specified, it was the third part of the freehold which the husband possessed at the time of betrothal. If more than a third part was named, the dower was after the husband's death cut down to a third. A gift of father of the bride to the intending husband—the maritigium of the later law. See above, p. 87, note 4.

2 Hence probably the species of dower called in later times 'ex assensu patris.'
3 See Ducange, s. v. Dosa.
4 Morgen-gifu—pretium virginizatis.
5 Emble, Cod. Dipl. 1. ex. By the Laws of Ethelbert (c. 81) it was provided that the morgen-gifu should devolve on the wife's paternal kindred if there were no issue of the marriage.
6 Lib. vi. c. 3.
7 'Tenetur quisque tam jure ecclesiastico quam jure seculari sponsam suam dotare tempore desponsationis.' Glanvill, lib. vi. c. 1.
less would however be a satisfaction of dower. It was sometimes permitted to increase the dower when the freehold available at the time of betrothal was small, by giving the wife a third part or less of subsequent acquisitions. This however must have been expressly granted at the time of betrothal. A woman could never claim more than had been granted ad ostium ecclesiae. Dower too might be granted to a woman out of chattels personal, and in this case she would be entitled to a third part. In process of time however this species of dower ceased to be regarded as legal, and was expressly denied to be law in the time of Henry IV. A trace of it still remains in the expression in the marriage service, ‘With all my worldly goods I thee endow.’

The proper remedy from the time of Glanvill, if the widow was wrongfully kept out of her dower, was by the real actions called the writ of right of dower, writ of dower, and of dower unde nihil habet; the last was only applicable when the widow was kept out of the whole of her dower. The first was applicable when she was deprived of part, and the second in all other cases. These forms of real actions were reserved in the statute by which most kinds of real actions were abolished, but had long fallen into disuse, before the changes in procedure under the Judicature Acts, which superseded all the ancient forms of action.

Magna Carta (ed. 1215), c. vii. Vidua post mortem mariti sui statim et sine difficultate aliqua habeat maritigum, et haereditatem suam, nec aliquid det pro dote sua, vel pro maritagio suo, vel haereditate sua quam haereditatem maritus suus et ipsa tenuerint die obitus ipsius mariti, et maneat in domo mariti sui per quadraginta dies post mortem ipsius infra quos assignetur ei dos sua.

In the charter of 1216 are added the words,—nisi prius ei dos fuerit assignata, vel nisi domus illa sit castrum, et si de castro

1 Glanvill, lib. vi. c. 2. 2 Blackstone, ii. p. 134.
3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 27, s. 36; and see 23 and 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 26.
4 i.e. her estate in frank-marriage (see above, p. 87, note 4).
5 Called ‘the widow’s quarantine.’ Blackstone, ii. p. 135.
recesserit, statim providentur ei domus competens in qua possit honeste morari quosque dos sua ei assignetur secundum quod praedictum est.

And in the edition of 1217 there is the further addition,—Assignetur autem ei pro dote sua tertia pars totius terrae mariti sui quae sua fuit in vita sua, nisi de minori dotata fuerit ad ostium ecclesiae.

c. viii. Nulla vidua distinguatur ad se maritandum dum voluerit vivere sine marito, ita tamen quod securitatem faciat quod se non maritabit sine assensu nostro, si de nobis tenerit, vel sine assensu domini sui de quo tenuerit, si de alio tenerit.

TRANSLATION.

c. vii. A widow, after the death of her husband, incontinent, and without any difficulty, shall have her marriage, and her inheritance, and shall give nothing for her dower, her marriage, or her inheritance, which her husband and she held the day of the death of her husband; and she shall tarry in the chief house of her husband by forty days after the death of her husband, within which days her dower shall be assigned her, if it were not assigned her before, or that the house be a castle; and if she depart from the castle, then a competent house shall be provided for her in the which she may honestly dwell, until her dower be to her assigned, as it is aforesaid; and she shall have in the meantime her reasonable estovers of the common; and for her dower shall be assigned unto her the third part of all the lands of her husband which were his during coverture, except she were endowed of less at the church door.

c. viii. No widow shall be distrained to marry herself, nevertheless she shall find surety that she shall not marry without our licence and assent, if she hold of us, nor without the assent of the lord, if she hold of another.

§ 5. Scutage and Aids.

During the Norman period a practice arose of making a composition in money for actual military service. This was called scutage or escuage. Madox finds traces of this practice as early as the reign of Henry I. It became very common in the reigns of Henry II, Richard I, and John. In the Dialogus de Scaccario (Henry II) scutagium is thus described: Fit interdum, ut imminente vel insurgente in regnum hostium machinatione decernat rex de singulis feodis militum summam aliquam solvi, marcam scilicet vel libram unam, unde militibus stipendia vel donativa succedant. Mavult enim principes stipendiorum quam domesticos bellicos opponere causibus. Hae itaque summa, quia nomine scutorum solvitur, scutagium nunquipater.

---

1 See p. 110, note 4.
2 It seems to have been the practice for the lord to exact a fine on his female tenant's marriage, and sometimes to compel or distress a widow to marry again in order to get the fine. See above, p. 41, note 4.

Every tenant in capite or immediate tenant of the Crown was bound either to supply the king with as many knights as he held knights' fees of the Crown, or to render an equivalent in money, the assessment of which must have been more or less arbitrary before this provision of Magna Carta. The fact of the tenant in capite doing personal service in the king's army, or paying or being duly charged with his escuage to the king, entitled him in his turn to escuage from his under-tenants by knight-service. Sometimes the amount so payable was fixed or ascertained in the charter of feoffment. But in many cases the uncertainty of the amount must have been felt as a great grievance, and hence the importance of this provision of Magna Carta. The significance of this chapter in its bearing on Constitutional History does not concern us here.

In the reissues of the Charter in the reign of Henry III the following articles were omitted. They were however revived by the Statute called 'Confirmatio Cartarum' (25 Edward I). The statute of Westminster I (3 Edward I, c. 36) ascertained the amount of aids to be taken by mesne lords, and the Statute 25 Edward III, ch. 5, c. 11, fixed those to be taken by the king.

---

1 The definite origin of scutage is assigned to the occasion of the expedition of Henry II to Toulouse in 1159. See Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. p. 456.
2 Hist. Exch. ch. 16.
3 Stubbs, Select Charters, p. 201.
4 Blackstone, ii. p. 65. See further as to scutage, below, § 11.
FORFEITURE.

MAGNA CARTA (ed. 1215), c. xii. Nullum seutagium vel auxilium ponatur in regno nostro, nisi per commune consilium regni nostri, nisi ad corpus nostrum redimendum, et primogenitum filium nostrum militem faciendum, et ad filiam nostram primogenitam semel maritandam, et ad haec non fiat nisi rationabile auxilium: similii modo fiat de auxiliis de civitate Londoniarum.

c. xv. Nos non concedemus de cetero aliqui quod capiat auxilium de libris hominibus suis, nisi ad corpus suum redimendum, et ad faciendum primogenitum filium suum militem, et ad primogenitam filiam suam semel maritandam, et ad haec non fiat nisi rationabile auxilium.

The text and translation of the statute 25 Ed. I. c. 6 is as follows:

E. ausi avums graunte pur nous e pur nos heyrs as Arcevesques, Evesques, Abbes, e Priours, e as autre gentz de soint egliise, e as Countes e Barouns, e a toute la communante de la terre, qe mes pur nule busoigne tieu manere des aydes, mises, ne prises, de nostre Roisme ne prendramus, fors ke par commun assent de tout le Roisme, e a commun profist de meisme le Roisme, sauve les auncienes aydes e prises, dues e accustumeees.

Moreover we have granted for us and our heirs, as well to Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, and other folk of holy church, as also to Earls, Barons, and to all the communalty of the land, that for no business from henceforth we shall take such manner of aids, tasks, nor prises, but by the common assent of the Realm, and for the common profit thereof, saving the ancient aids and prises due and accustomed.

§ 6. Forfeiture.

MAGNA CARTA (1215), c. xxxii. Nos non tenebimus terras illorum qui convicti fuerint de felonia, nisi per unum annum et unum diem, et tunc reddantur terrae dominis feudorum.

1 Seutagium is properly distinguished from auxilium: sometimes however the word is used in a large sense, as equivalent to any payment assessed on a knight’s fee, and so including aids.
2 See above, pp. 49, 77.
3 This is printed as a Statute in ‘Statutes at Large.’ In Statutes of the Realm it is included in the collection of Charters, vol. i. p. 37. The text is taken from the former, the translation from the latter; and see Coke’s 2nd Inst. 529.
4 See above, p. 82.
TRANSLATION.

§ 6. c. xxxii. We will not hold the lands of them that be convict of felony but one year and one day; and then those lands shall be delivered to the lord of the fee.

§ 7. Alienation.¹

MAGNA CARTA (1217), c. xxxix. Nullus liber homo de cetero det amplius alicui vel vendat de terra sua quam ut de residuo terrae suae possit sufficenter fieri domino feodi servitium ei debitum quod pertinet ad feodum illud.

TRANSLATION.

c. xxxix. No freeman from henceforth shall give or sell any more of his land, but so that of the residue of the lands the lord of the fee may have the service due to him which belongeth to the fee.

§ 8. Mortmain.²

MAGNA CARTA (1217), c. xliii. Non liceat alicui de cetero dare terram suam alicui domui religiosae ita quod illum resumat tenendum de eadem domo. Nec liceat alicui domui religiosae terram alicuius sic accipere quod tradat eam illi a quo eam receperit tenendum. Si quis autem de cetero terram suam alicui domui religiosae sic dederit et super hoc convincaetur, dominum suum penitus cassetur et terra illa domino suo illius feodi incurratur.

TRANSLATION.

c. xliii. It shall not be lawful from henceforth to any to give his lands to any religious house, and to take the same land again, to hold of the same house. Nor shall it be lawful to any house of religion to take the lands of any, and to lease the same to him of whom they were received to be holden. If any from henceforth so give his lands to any religious house, and thereupon be convict, the gift shall be utterly void, and the land shall accrue to the lord of the fee.

¹ For the meaning of this enactment and the history of the law of alienation, see below, § 14, and Chap. IV, § 5.
² For the law of mortmain and the construction of this enactment, see below, Chap. IV, § 2.
§ 9. Rights of the Lord of a Manor over the Waste.

Statute of Merton, 20 Henry III, c. iv. Item quia multi magnates Angliae, qui feoffaverint milites et libere tenentes suas de parvis tenementis in magnis maneris suis, questi fuerunt quod commodum suum facere non potuerunt de residuo maneriorum suorum, sicut de vastis, bovis, et pasturis, quam ipsi feoffati habent sufficientem pasturam, quantum pertinet ad tenementa sua: ita provisum est et concessum, quod quicunque hujusmodi feoffati assisam novae disseisinae deferant de communis pasturae suae, et coram justiciis recognitum fuerit quod tanta pasturam habebant quantum sufficit ad tenementa sua, et quod habebant liberum ingressum et egressum de tenementis suis usque ad pasturam suam, tunc inde sint contenti, et illi de quibus conquiserint fuerint recedent quieti de hoc quod commodum suum de terris, vastis, bovis, et pasturis fecerint. Si autem dixerint quod sufficientem pasturam non habebant, vel sufficientem ingressum vel egressum, quantum pertinet ad tenementa sua, tunc inquiratur veritas per assisam. Et per assisam recognitum fuerit, per eodem quod in aliquo fuerit impeditus corum ingressus vel egressus, vel quod non habebant sufficientem pasturam et sufficientem ingressum et egressum sicut praedictum est, tunc recuperent seissam suam per visum juratorum: ita quod per discretionem et sacramentum corum habebant conquerentes sufficientem pasturam et sufficientem ingressum et egressum in forma praedicta; et disseisores sint in misericordia domini regis, et damna reddant sicut reddi debent ante provisionem istam. Si autem recognitum fuerit per assisam quod querentes sufficientem habent pasturam, cum libero et sufficiente ingressu et egressu ut praedictum est; tunc licite faciant alii commodum suum de residuo, et recedant de illa assisa quieti.

Translation.

c. iv. Also because many great men of England, which have infeoffed knights and their freeholders of small tenements in their great manors, have complained that they cannot make their profit of the residue of their manors, as of wastes, woods, and pastures, whereas the same feoffees have sufficient pasture as much as belongeth to their tenements; it is provided and granted, That whenever such feoffees do bring an assize of novel disseisin for their common of pasture, and it is knowledged before the Justiciers, that they have as much pasture as sufficeth to their tenements,

1 See below, § 18 (2).
and that they have free egress and regress from their tenement unto the pasture, then let them be contented therewith; and they on whom they have complained shall go quit for that they have made their profit of their lands, wastes, woods, and pastures; and if they allege that they have not sufficient pasture, or sufficient ingress and egress according to their hold, then let the truth be inquired by assize, and if it be found by the assize that the same deforcors have in any thing disturbed them of their ingress and egress, or that they had not sufficient pasture, as before is said, then shall they recover their seisin by view of the inquest, so that by their discretion and oath the plaintiffs shall have sufficient pasture, and sufficient ingress and egress in form aforesaid; and the disseisors shall be amerced, and shall yield damages as they were wont before this provision. And if it be certified by the assize that the plaintiffs have sufficient pasture with ingress and egress, as before is said, let the other make their profit of the residue, and go quit of that assize.

SECTION II.

EXTRACTS FROM BRACTON.

The following passage, taken in connexion with the extract from Glanvill's preface given in the last chapter (§ 1), illustrates what has been said above as to the development of the law at this period by means of recorded judicial decisions.

HENRICI DE BRACTON, De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliae.

Lib. i. Pref. Cum autem fere in omnibus regionibus utantur legibus et jure scripto, sola Anglia usa est in suis finibus jure non scripto et consuetudine. In ea quidem ex non scripto jus venit quod usus comprobavit. Sed absurdum non est leges Anglicanas (licet non scriptas) leges appellare, cum legis vigorem habeat, quicquid de consilio et de consensu magnum et rei publicae communis spondise, auctoritate regis sive principis praeecedente, justa fuerit definitum et approbatum. Sunt autem in Anglia consuetudines plures et diversae secundum diversitatem locorum. Habent enim Anglici plurima ex consuetudine quae non habent
TENURES.

ex lege, sicut in diversis comitatibus, civitatibus, burgis et villis, ubi semper inquirendum erit, quae sit illius loci consuetudo, et qualiter utantur consuetudines qui consuetudines allegant 1. Cum autem hujusmodi leges et consuetudines per insipientes et minus doctos, (qui cathedram judicandi ascendent antequam leges dixerint,) saepius trahantur ad abusum, et qui stant in dubio et in opinionibus multoiens pervertuntur a majoribus, qui potius proprio arbitrio quam legum auctoritate causas decidunt, ad instructionem saltem minorum ego Henricus de Bracton animum erexi ad vetera judicia justorum perscrutanda diligentiter, non sine vigiliiis et labore; facta ipsorum, consilia et quæstiones, et quicquid inde notatu dignum inveni, in unam summam redigendo, sub ordine titulorum et paragraphorum (sine melioris sententiae praecipue) compilavi, scripturasque suffragio perpetuo memoriae commendanda.

§ 11. Tenures.

The following extracts give the outline of Bracton’s division of Tenures. Tenures now fall into two great classes. There had always been a distinction in point of fact between the holding of land by a free tenant and the beneficial enjoyment of land permitted to the non-free. In Bracton’s time freehold tenure or the holding of land by free services had come to be opposed to the holding of land by non-free services or services unworthy of a free tenant. What was formerly a distinction principally affecting the status of the holder comes now to be regarded as the basis of two different classes of rights of property. Dealing first with freehold tenures, Bracton proceeds to enumerate their principal classes,—knight-service, grand serjeanty, socage, and tenure by uncertain but non-military services. The nature of the tenure depends on the service to be rendered in respect of the land. The following passages seem to lead to the following principal conclusions.

(1) Where land is held of a mesne lord by knight-service the actual military service is due, not to the immediate lord, but to the king 2. The only exception to this rule seems to have been when the lord went with the king in propria persona.

---

1 As to local custom, see above, pp. 66, 72; below, Chap. V. § 6.
2 See above, p. 36.
The theory seems to have been that for every knight's fee the service unius militis for forty days in every year, if called upon, or scutage in lieu thereof, was due to the Crown.¹

(2) Where military service is thus due to the king the tenure is knight-service, and the lord enjoys the valuable incidents of wardship and marriage.

(3) No services of whatever character rendered to the lord in his private capacity are sufficient, according to the better opinion, to give the tenure the character of tenure by knight-service, and consequently to cause the incidents of wardship and marriage to attach. The services must be propter exercitum regis et patriae tuitionem. In the case of freehold tenure where no military service is due a further distinction arises between tenure by uncertain services to be rendered to the lord, and socage tenure. These however probably were generally confounded together ², and the distinguishing characteristic was evidently the one of most practical importance,—whether the lord was or was not entitled to wardship and marriage.

(4) Whether the land was held by knight-service or otherwise was a question of evidence to be decided first by reference to the charter by which the land might be burdened with military service or its equivalent, although it had been previously free from burdens, or freed from them, although previously so burdened; or if the charter was silent, regard must be had to the character and amount of the services customarily rendered in respect of the land in question, or of land in its neighbourhood. When, as was usually if not always the case (except with the king's own immediate tenants), no actual military service was rendered to the king by any one in respect of the land held by knight-service ³,

¹ See Coke upon Littleton, 69 a, and Madox, History of the Exchequer, chap. xvi; above, § 5, and Chap. I. p. 60, note 3.
² Littleton expressly declares (a. 118) that every tenure that is not a tenure in chivalry is tenure in socage.
³ In process of time a distinction seems to have arisen between the liability of tenants who held of the king ut de corona (that is, where the lands had
scutage was paid to the king in lieu thereof, to the amount assessed by the great Council, by his own immediate tenants by knight-service, whether such tenants were actually in possession of the land or not. It further appears that if a mesne lord went with the king to war or made satisfaction to the king in any manner in respect of such service, he in his turn might exact scutage from his tenants by knight-service to the amount assessed by the great Council, provided no tenant had either by himself or by deputy rendered actual service with the king in respect of the knight’s fee for which the scutage was claimed.

Lib. iv. c. 28. fol. 207. Item dicitur liberum tenementum, ad differentiam ejus quod est villenagium⁵, quia tenementorum alius liberum alius villenagium.

Item liberorum alius tenetur libere pro homagio et servitio militari, alius in libero socagio cum fidelitate tantum, vel cum fidelitate et homagio secundum quosdam. Item liberorum alius pura et libera et perpetua eleemosyna⁴, quae quidem sunt tam in bonis hominum quam in bonis Dei; quia dantur non solum Deo et tali ecclesiae, sed abbatibus et prioribus ibidem Deo servientibus. Item est tenementum datum in liberam eleemosynam actually been or were supposed to have been granted by the king or one of his predecessors to the tenant or his ancestor), and that of tenants who held of the king ut de honore (that is, where the king was temporarily or permanently entitled to the seignory in his capacity as lord paramount by virtue of escheat, wardship, &c.). The former class seem to have been considered to be strictly bound to personal attendance on the king, the latter not. Madox (Hist. of Exchequer, p. 454) gives two instances in the reign of Edward II of tenants holding ut de honore claiming on that ground exemption from personal service.

¹ A further exception occurred where the seignory of land, the tenants of which had not been accustomed to render military service, was granted by the king to a person to be held of the king by knight-service. In that case the grantee would be bound to render scutage, but could not in his turn exact it from his tenants. See the case of Roger de Sumervill, 27 Henry III, Madox, History of the Exchequer, p. 471. As to scutage generally, see Fitzherbert, Natura Brevium, 83, 84 a; Wright’s Tenures, p. 129; Madox, Hist. of Exchequer, c. xvi; Coke upon Littleton, 72 b.

² For the meaning of villenagium in Bracton, see § 13.

³ The land is to be held in return for, i.e. by homage and service.

⁴ See above, p. 38.
CH. III. rectoribus ecclesiis quae pura est et libera et magis libera et pura.

§ 11. Lib. ii. c. 16. fol. 37. Item poterit quis feoffari ab alio per diversa genera servitiorum facienda, scilicet per servitium unius denarii, et reddendo scutagium, et per seriantiam unam vel plures. Et unde si tantum in denariis et sine scutagio vel seriantiis¹, vel si ad duo teneatur sub disjunctione, scilicet ad certam rem damdam pro omni servitio vel aliquam summam in denariis, id tenementum dici potest socagium². Si autem superaddat scutagium et servitium regale licet ad unum obolum vel seriantiam, secundum quod superius dictum est, illud dici poterit feodum militare.

Lib. ii. c. 16. fol. 35 b. Item sunt quaedam servitia quae pertinent ad dominum capitalem, et quae consistunt in factionibus, et sunt ex consuetudine, de termino in terminum, et de quibus oportet quod fiat mentio in scriptura³, et alioquin peti non poterunt, ut si dicatur 'et faciendo inde sectam⁴ ad curiam domini sui et haereditum suorum de quindem in quindecim, vel de tribus septimanis in tres septimanas, quolibet anno de termino in terminum.' Item 'faciendo inde tot annuras, et tot mesuras, tot falcationes,' et quae omnia pertinent ad dominos feodi ex tenementis sic datis liberis hominibus, et provenient ex tenementis, et dici possunt feodalia sive praelia servitia, et non personalia, nisi ratione praeliorum et tenementorum. Item poterit quis feoffare alium per seriantiam, quae quidem multiplex esse poterit, et unde quaedam pertinent ad ipsum dominum feoffatum, et quaedam ad ipsum regem, ut si dicatur, per servitium equitandi cum domino suo vel domina, qui proprie dicuntur Rodknightes, vel per servitia tenendi placita dominorum suorum, vel portandi brevia infra certa loca, vel passendi leporarios et canes, vel mutandii aves, vel inveniendi arcus et sagittas, vel portandi; et de iis seriantiis non poterit certus numerus comprehendi. Et hujusmodi servitia omnia dici possunt intrinsecas, quia in chartis et instrumentis sunt exprimenda et dominis capitalibus remanebunt. Et cum propter exercitum regis et patriae tuitionem non sunt, ideo ex talibus servitiis nullum competere deberet maritagium, nec custodia domino capitis, non

¹ The tenure of grand serjeanty was usually, though not always, free from liability to scutage. Madox, Hist. Exch. ch. xvi. p. 452.
² See above, p. 45.
³ That is, in the writing which is the evidence of the grant; see below, § 12.
⁴ Súl, attendance.
TENURES.

CH. III.

Sect. II.

§ 11.

magis quam de socagio. Ecce hic dicitur quod ex parvis seriantiis, quae non respiciant regem, nec patriae defensionem, ut equitare cum domino vel domina, et portare brevia et hujusmodi, non habebitur maritgium, cuius contrarium ponit per exemplum. Contrarium autem habetur de quadam Abbatissa de Berkingle inter placita quae sequuntur regem anno regni regis Henrici . . . coram W. de Raleigh, et quae recuperavit custodiem et maritgium de haerede cujusdam tenentis sui, qui tenebat tenementum sumum in manerio de Berkingle servitium equitandi cum ea de manerio in manerium; quod quidem Stephanus de Segrave non approbat.

Sunt et alia genera seriantiae quae ad dominum capitalem non pertinent, sed ad dominum regem, pro exercitu regis ad patriae tuitionem vel defensionem, et hostium deprehensionem: ut si quis ita feoffatus fuerit scilicet per seriantiam inveniendi domino regi unum hominem vel plures, ad eundum cum eo in expeditionem ad exercitum, equites vel pedites, cum aliquo generi armorum, et ex tali seriantia competit domino capitale sive de domino rege tenuerit, sive de aliio, custodia et maritgium haeredis, quod quidem non esset tenendum in casibus praedictis. Illud idem servatur, si quis tenet per servitium inveniendi domino regis certis locis et certis temporibus unum hominem, et unum equum, et saccum cum brochia pro aliqua necessitate vel utilitate exercitum sumum contingentem.

Item sunt quaedam servitia quae dicuntur forinseca, quamvis sunt in charta de feoffamentis expressa et nominata, et quae ideo dicit eos sunt forinseca, quia pertinent ad dominum regem, et non ad dominum capitalem, nisi cum in propria persona pecuniae fuerit in servitio, vel nisi cum pro servitio suo satisfecerit domino regi quocumque modo, et siunt incertas temporibus, cum casus et necessitas evenerit, et varia habent nomina et diversa. Quandoque enim nominantur forinseca, large sumpto vocabulo, quoad servitium domini regis, quandoque scutatum, quandoque servitium domini regis, et ideo forinseca dicit potest, quia sit et capitur foris sive extra servitium quod sit domino capitali. Item scu-

1 Bracton here uses the expression 'parva seriantia' in a different sense from that in which it was used by Littleton (section 159), who defines tenure by petit serjeany to be where land is held of the king by the duty of rendering some small thing, such as an arrow, belonging to war.

2 'In the King's Bench.' The King's Bench being that branch or department of the Curia Regis which was not fixed at Westminster, but which, in theory at least, followed the king wheresoever he might be in England. This was the proper style of the Court up to November 1, 1875.

See above, p. 35.
tagium, quod talis prestatio pertinet ad scutum, quod assumitur ad servitium militare. Item dicitur regale servitium, quia specialiter pertinet ad dominum regem et non ad alium, et secundum quod in Conquesta fuit adiinventum, et hujusmodi servitiae per solvuntur ratione tenementorum et non personarum, quia ex tenementis proveniunt. . . . . . . Et quia tale servitium forinseum non semper manet sub cadem quantitate, sed quandoque praestatur ad plus, quandoque ad minus, ideo de qualitate regalis servitii et quantitate fiat mentio in charta, ut tenens certum tenere possit quid et quantum persolvere teneatur: quod quidem dicit poterit de sectis, quae pertinent ad dominum capitalem, cum possint ibi varia et diversa tempora denotari, de quibus fit mentio supra. Sed si sic dicatur, ‘reddendo inde per annum tantum et faciendo tales sectas pro omnibus servitio, excepto regali servitio,’ vel ‘salvo forinsecus,’ tunc videndum erit imprimit si feodium illud in ipsa donatione forinseum debuit ab initio vel non. Si autem nullum debuit ab initio, nec sit certum forinseum in charta expressum, nunquam praestabitur, nec peti poterit propter incertitudinem. Si autem ab initio nullum, sed in ipsa donatione convenerit quod detur subsequium, et in charta exprimatur certum, erit omnino praestandum. Et sicut poterit donator libere donare quam ipse teneurit, et onerare seipsum et haeredes suos erga suos feoffatores, ita poterit sumum feoffatum onerare ad plura servititia et ad alia, quam ipsum teneatur feoffatori suo. Poterit enim de socagio facere servitium militare, et e verso, si a convenerit ab initio inter ipsum et feoffatum sumum. Sed quid si feodium feoffatoris non debat forinseum, et donator dererit pro forinseco, tunc referat utrum certum et expressum vel non. Si autem incertum, tunc tale quid peti non poterit, si autem forinseum debuit ab initio, sed tamen in charta donatoris non exprimatur certum, videtur prima facie quod peti non potest. Sed revera sic erit intelligendum, quod tale et tantundem praestandum sit quantum praestant aliis qui tenent tenementa in eadem villa et de codem feodo per servitium militare.

(1) A Charter of Feoffment.

The ordinary mode of granting an estate of freehold was by the process called a feoffment. A feoffment, as has been seen,

1 See above, Chap. I. sect. ii. § 1.
2 See above, Chap. I. sect. iii. § 2.
LIVERY OF SEISIN.

consists of two parts. There must be (1) words of donation expressing the nature and extent of the interest to be taken by the feoffee, (2) livery of seisin, the ceremony fixed upon by law as that which is essential to pass the seisin, or possession as of freehold, from the feoffor to the feoffee.

The following extract is the specimen Bracton gives of a charter of feoffment. Though it was by no means necessary that the words of donation should be embodied in writing, it was usual, for the obvious object of preserving evidence of the grant, that a charter or deed of feoffment should be executed. Writing was first made essential to a feoffment by the Statute of Frauds 1.

BRACTON, lib. ii. c. 16. fol. 34 b. Fit autem donatio in scriptura per haec verba. Sciant praesentes et futuri quod ego talis dedi et concessi et hac praesenti charta mea confirmavi tali, pro homagio et servitio suo, tantam terram cum pertinentiis in tali villa . . . . habendam et tenendum tali et haeredibus suis (generaliter v. l. cum coarctatione haeredum 2) . . . . libere et quiete . . . . vel assignatio 3 . . . . reddendo inde per annum tantum ad certos terminos tales, et faciendo inde tali servitio et tales consuetudines . . . . pro omni servitio consuetudine seculari exactione et demanda, (per quam generaliter videtur expresse remittere omnia alia servitio, consuetudines, et demandas seculares, quae ad dominum pertinent de tenemento, licet hoc in charta expresse non continetur).

(2) Livery of Seisin.

It is doubtful whether the doctrines relating to livery of seisin are mere applications of the rules of the civil law, or whether they are derived from primitive customs, of which the analogous rules of Roman law may themselves be a development. Whatever may be the origin of the notion of livery of seisin, the following passage shows that the rules of Roman law were applied to define and regulate the doctrine. Bracton here imports certain principles from

1 29 Car. II. c. 3.
2 See below, Chap. IV. § 3.
3 For the effect of these words see below, § 14.
the civilians, especially from Azo\(^1\), bearing on the theory of possession, and applies them to the doctrine of livery of seisin, which was the appropriate mode of transferring a freehold interest in lands from one person to another.

In order to acquire \textit{possessio} two elements are necessary: (1) the consciousness of actual or possible physical control of the thing which is the subject of acquisition; (2) the \textit{animus sibi habendi}. The requisites for the acquisition of \textit{possessio} were to this extent common with the requisites for acquiring property by \textit{traditio} or delivery; and the application of these rules gave rise to the feudal notion of investiture\(^2\)—the clothing the donee with the actual possession of the land the subject of the grant.

Since, as has been seen, freehold interests in land were formerly the only interests known to the law, a grant of land is synonymous with a grant of a freehold interest in land, and the doctrines of Roman law as to conveying things moveable by \textit{traditio}, and things immovable by allowing the donee to enter on the vacant possession, gave rise to the principle that for passing a freehold interest in lands a ceremony was necessary by which the possession of the land itself should be given to the donee. This was livery or delivery of the seisin or possession of the land, and was effected either by the donor himself or his deputy. What did and what did not amount to ‘livery of seisin’ now becomes a curious question. Speaking generally, it must be the delivery of something, such as a clod of earth or a twig, on the land in the name of the whole, or it was sufficient if the two parties were actually present on the land and the one by word or act gave possession to the other. It was even effectual for the donor to bring the donee within sight of the land and to give him authority to enter, provided this

\(^1\) See Götterbock, \textit{H. de Bracto und sein Verhältnis zum Römischen Rechte}, pp. 59-70, and compare with the whole of the following extract the title in the Digest \textit{De Acquirenda vel Amittenda Possessione}, libr. xli. tit. ii.

\(^2\) See Spelman, \textit{sub voce}.
were followed by the entry of the donee during the lifetime of the donor

Great importance was attached to the notoriety of the transaction. That all the neighbours might know that A was tenant to B from the fact that open livery of seisin had been made to him, was of the utmost importance to B in order to protect and to enable him to assert his rights as lord. For in case of dispute as to the title to the lands, or the right to services, aids or reliefs, the fact of this open and notorious livery of seisin enabled the lord to appeal to the tribunal before which, since the reforms of Henry II, suits relating to land were commonly decided,—the verdict of twelve legales homines de vicineto, who would know themselves or have heard from their fathers the truth of the matter.

Bracton, lib. ii. c. 18. fol. 39. Item non valet donatio nisi subsequentur traditio, quia non transfertur per homagium res data, nec per chartarum vel instrumentorum confectionem, quamvis in publico fuerint recitata. Item neque per imaginariam traditionem, ubi corpore recedit et animo retinet possessionem, et vult potius quod res data cum eo remaneat, quam transeat ad donatorum, et unum agit et alterum agere simulat, sed tunc demum cum donator plenam fecerit seisinam donario per se si praesens fuerit, vel per procuratorem et litterae si absens fuerit, ita quod charta donationis et litterae procuratoriae coram vicinis ad hoc specialiter convocatis legantur in publico, et etiam cum donator corpore et animo recesserit a possessione, si absens fuerit in ipso traditione, sine aliqua spe et animo revertendi, ut dominus, et cum donatorius in possessione vacua extiterit corpore et animo,

1 See Coke upon Littleton, 48 b; where with characteristic refinement he distinguishes between livery in deed, or actual delivery of possession, and livery in law, where the transaction does not take place upon, but in sight of, the land, and is followed by the entry of the feeantor. In the case of livery not upon the lands, if the feeantor was prevented by violence or threats from entering, his estate might become completely vested by making in proper form every year ‘continual claim.’ See Littleton, lib. iii. c. 7.

2 Compare Dig. lib. xii. tit. ii. 1. § 20.

3 Compare the texts of Roman law: ‘Adipiscimur possessionem corpore et animo neque per se animo aut per se corpore;’ Dig. lib. xii. tit. ii. 3. § 1: ‘Nulla possessor adquiri nisi animo et corpore potest;’ Ib. 8.
et cum voluntate retinendi possessionem, et quod unus desinat et alius incepiat possidere, quia donator nunc quam desinat possidere, donec donatorius plenarie fuerit in seisina, nec jacebit seisina aliquo tempore medio vacua. Videndum est primo quid sit traditio; et est traditio de re corporali propria vel aliena de persona in personam de manu propria vel aliena, sicut procuratoria dum tamen de voluntate domini, in alterius manum gratis.

Et nihil aliud est traditio in uno sensu nisi in possessionem inductio de re corporali; ideo dicitur quod res incorporalis non patitur traditionem; sicut ipsum jus quod rei sive corpori inhaeret, et quia non possunt res incorporales possideri sed quasi, ideo traditionem non patiuntur sed quasi, nec adquiruntur nec retinentur nisi per patientiam et usum. De re propria vel aliena ideo dicit, quod refert quia traditionem facere possit, et sciendum quod omnes qui donationem etc. sive sit dominus sive non dominus. Sis antem fiat traditio a vero domino, statim et sine mora incipit donatorius habere liberum tenementum, propter conjunctionem juris et seisinae et mutuum utriusque partis consensum; et sufficit semel voluisse in ipsa traditione vel post traditionem, et quia res quae traditione nostrae fuerint, jure gentium nobis adquiruntur. Nihil enim tam conveniens est naturali aequitati quam desiderium domini velvolis in alium rem suam transference ratum habere. Et nihil interest an ipse dominus per se tradat aliqui rem suam datam, an aliquus voluntate ipsius sicut per procuratorem, si ipse praeclam non fuerit, vel per nuntium, cum literis tamen procuratorii patentiibus, ut supradictum est in parte, continentibus voluntatem ipsius donatoris. Et in quo casu ostendatur litterae et charta, ut dici

1 For the hearing of this principle that the freehold can never be in abeyance upon the rules of law relating to the conveyance of rights of future enjoyment, see below, Chap. V. § 3.
2 Compare fol. 13: 'Item gratuita debet esse donatio et non concta nec per metum vel vi extorta.'
3 Compare Dig. lib. xlii. tit. ii. 33: 'Fundi venditor eiiamsi mandaverit aliqui, ut emporium in vacuam possessionem induceret, priusquam id fieret, non recte emporor per se in possessionem veniet.'
4 As to the modes of acquiring incorporeal hereditaments, see below, § 18 (1). On the doctrine of the Roman lawyers as to quasi possessio or possession in an analogous sense of incorporeal things, or rights over the property of another, see Savigny's Treatise on Possession, translated by Sir E. Perry, pp. 130-134.
5 For as observed above, p. 92, a person may be 'seised' by wrong, as when a wrongdoer turns out the rightful tenant he becomes 'seised' in his stead.
6 Taken from the Institutes of Justinian, ii. i. § 40.
LIVERY OF SEISIN.

poterit, talis habuit et breve et charta, secundum quod Anglice dicitur, he had both writ and charter. Et sive fiat traditio per totum fundum possidet usque ad certos terminos, cum omnibus juribus et pertinentiis suis, et ubi non est necesse omnes glebas circumire, nec ubique nec unidue pedem ponere, fieri debet traditio per estium et per haspam vel anulum, et sse erit in possessione de toto ex voluntate et ascepta et possidendi affectu 1. Si autem nullum sit ibi aedificium, fiat ei seisinam, secundum quod vulgariter dicitur, per fustim et per baculum, et sufficit sola pedis positio cum possidendi affectu ex voluntate dona-toris, quamvis statim expleta non ceperit, poterit enim habere quis liberum tenementum ex traditione, quamvis statim non utatur, nee expleta capiantur, quia usus et expleta non multum operantur ad donationem. Valent tamen multotiens ad possessionis declarationem, et dici poterunt vestimenta donationem sicut traditio.

* * * * *

Item sufficit pro traditione corporali nuda voluntas domini ad alium, quasi mutata causa possessionis, dum tamen fiat cum solemnitate quod probatio non deficiat; ut si quis rem alieni locaverit vel concesserit ad terminum vitae vel annorum, et postea eidem vendererit vel donaverit, licet eam ex tali causa primo non haburit, eo tamen quod ipse dominus patitur eam ex tali causa vel alia quacunque apud eum esse, sua efficitur 2. Eodem modo si ex nulla justa causa praecedente, sed si per intrusionem vel disseisinam sit

1 'Quod autem diximus et corpore et animo adquirere nos debere posses-sionem, non utique ita accipiendum est, ut qui fundum possidere velit omnes glebas circumambulet; sed sufficit quamlibet partem ejus fundi introire, dum mente et cogitatione habeat, uti totum fundum usque ad terminum velit possidere.' Digg. xli. ii. 3. § 1.

2 'The mere will of the owner is sometimes sufficient to effect the transfer of the corporeal tenement to another. The ground upon which the right to the possession rests is as it were changed. This however must be accompanied by some form sufficient to afford evidence of the intention of the trans-feror, &c.' Compare Digg. xii. ii. 3. § 19: 'Ilud quoque a veteribus praeceptum est neominem sibi ipsum causam possessionis mutare posse. Sed si is, qui audeit me deponevit vel commodavit, eam rem vendiderit mihi vel donaverit, non videtur causam possessionis mihi mutare, qui ne possidebam quidem.' Compare too the mode of conveyance by lease and release, i.e.

where the lessee was in possession of land under a lease for years and then the lessor released the reversion to him by deed. See below, Chap. V.

§ 1.

In early times, as has before been said, only freemen held property in land. Every person having an interest recognised and protected by law is of necessity a freeholder. The practice however of allowing villeins to continue to occupy their lands without interruption, and even to alienate and transmit their interests to their descendants, has given a new sense to the word villenagium, which has now come to mean (1) the nature of a villein's interest in land, (2) the kind of interest which a villein has, though the land may be held by a freeman. Though there is some distinction, as pointed out in the text, between the rights which the lord would have against a villein and against a freeman holding in villenage, they resemble each other in this, that both hold at the will of the lord and can be turned out of the occupation of the land by him at any moment. Neither therefore can bring an assize, for this is a remedy applicable only to the freehold. There is nothing however to prevent the lord entering into a covenant with his villein, or freeman holding in villenage, to secure the continued enjoyment of the tenure. This covenant can be enforced by the villein, or freeman holding in villenage and it appears that by a writ of covenant the villenagium itself might be recovered. This is the first step towards the legal recognition of estates in copyhold, exactly identical, as will be seen, with the first step in the legal re-

---

1 That is, a disseisor who was in by wrong might, since he had actually the seisin, accept a release of the rights of the disseisor (the rightful owner), and so acquire an indefeasible estate (see Blackstone, ii. p. 324, and above, p. 97).
cognition of leasehold interests. At this time the villein, or the freeman holding in villenage (except when he is protected by an express covenant under seal entered into by the lord), holds strictly at the will of the lord. The only restraints upon the will of the lord are those imposed by custom and moral or religious sanctions. The steps by which these customary practices gradually came to be recognised and enforced in courts of justice, and grew into legal rights, will be noticed in the fifth chapter.

Bracton, lib. iv. cap. 28. fol. 208. Item tenementorum alium villenagium, et villenagiorum alium purum alium privilegiatum. Purum autem villenagium est, quod sic tenetur, quod ille qui tenet in villenagio, sive liber sive servus, faciet de villenagio quicquid ei praeceptum fuerit, nec scire debet sero quid facere debet in crastino, et semper tenebitur ad incerta. Taliari autem potest ad voluntatem domini ad plus vel ad minus. Item dare mercatum 3 ad filiam maritandam, et ita semper tenebitur ad incerta; ita tamen quod si liber homo sit, hoc faciat nomine villenagii et non nomine personae, nec enim tenebitur ad mercatum de jure, quia hoc non pertinet ad personam liberi sed villani. Si autem villanus fuerit, omnia faciat et incerta tam ratione villenagii quam personae, nec liber homo, si sic tenuerit, contra voluntatem domini villenagium retinere poterit, nec ipse compelli quod retineat nisi velit. Est etiam villenagium non ita purum sive concedatur libero homini vel villano ex conventione 4 tenendum pro certis servitutibus et consuetudinibus nominatis et expressis, quamvis servitua et consuetudines sunt villanae. Et unde si liber ejectus fuerit, vel villanus manumissus vel alienatus, recuperare non poterunt ut liberum tenementum cum sit villenagium, et cadit assisa, vertitur tamen in juratam 5 ad inquirendum de conventione, propter voluntatem

1 See below, § 17.
2 'He is liable to be taxed.'
3 'He pays a fine for the privilege of giving his daughter in marriage.'
4 'As an incident of his tenure, not of personal servitude.'
5 Conventio, 'covenant,' i.e. agreement by deed under seal, i.e. writing on paper or parchment sealed and delivered. Breve de conventione, 'writ of covenant.' Breach of a covenant always was a ground for an action at law.
6 That is, the recognitors of the assize who had been summoned to decide the questions raised in the Assize of Novel Disseisin (see above, p. 94) were turned into a jury to determine on the fact of the existence of the alleged covenant. At this time the practice of determining questions by the voice of the recognitors of the assize was developing into trial by jury in civil proceedings generally. See Reeves, i. p. 354.
dimmittentis et consensum, quia si querentes in tali casu recuperaverint villenagium, non erit propter hoc domino injuriatum propter ipsius voluntatem et consensum, et contra voluntatem suam jura ei non subveniant, quia si dominus potest villanum manumittere et foedare, multo potius poterit ei quandam conventionem facere, et quia si potest id quod plus est, potest multo fortius id quod minus est. Est etiam alium genus villenagii quod tenetur de domino rege, a Conquestu Angliae, quod dicitur socagium villanum, et quod est villenagium, sed tamen privilegium. Habent itaque tenentes de dominici domini regis tale privilegium, quod a gleba amoveri non debent, quandam velint et possint facere debitum servitium, et hujusmodi villani sokmanni proprie dicuntur globae ascripticii. Villana autem faciunt servitio sed certa et determinata. Nee compelli poterunt contra voluntatem suam ad tenenda hujusmodi tenementa, et ideo dicuntur liberi. Dare autem non possunt tenementa sua, nec ex causa donationis ad alios transferre, non magis quam villani puri, et unde si transferri debeant, restituunt ea domino vel balivo, et ipsi ea tradunt alii in villenagium tenenda.

1 From this it appears that by this form of action the villenagium itself, i.e. the right to hold the land under the obligation to render the accustomed services, could be recovered.

2 This tenure is that from which the species of copyhold tenure known as ‘ancient demesne’ derived its origin. See Blackstone, ii. p. 98. Bracton (lib. i. cap. xi. fol. 7) describes what is probably the same class, as having been free men at the time of the Conquest, holding lands by free services, and as afterwards having received back their lands to be held by villein services, but retaining their personal status of freedom. As holders in villenage the assizes of novel disseisin and of mort d’ancestor were not available to them, but they might employ a remedy called by Bracton ‘parvum breve de recto secundum consuetudinem manerii.’

3 The variety of customs prevailing in various districts gave rise to various species of tenure, which later lawyers found a difficulty in classifying. We find in later times that it was sometimes a matter of dispute whether a particular tenure was freehold or copyhold. Coke (Compl. Copyholder, xxxii) speaks of ‘copyholds of frank-tenure which are most usual in ancient demesne. Though sometimes out of ancient demesne we shall meet with the like sort of copyholds, as in Northamptonshire there are tenants which hold by copy of court roll, and have no other evidence, and yet hold not at the will of the lord. These kind of copyholders have the frank-tenure in them, and it is not in their lords, as in case of copyholds of base tenure.’ See Blackstone’s tract, ‘Considerations on Copyholds;’ and see below, Chap. V. § 6.

4 See as to the mode of alienating copyholds, Chap. V. § 6.

The probable early history of alienation, and the limitations to which it was subject in the interest of the family or of the heir, have already been sketched. Every limitation on alienation based on the principles of the early customary law has disappeared by the time of Bracton. But with the dominating influence of the great lords, endeavours were made to impose other restrictions on the freedom of alienation.

It appears that about the time of the passing of the provisions quoted above from Magna Carta, strenuous attempts were made in the interest of the great lords to prevent a tenant alienating any part of his land. These attempts however, as appears from the following passage, were not successful. The provision in Magna Carta given above appears to be the only restraint upon alienation of lands in fee simple ever recognised by law in the interests of the lord. When lands were held of a mesne lord, the effect of this provision seems to have been that if the lands were alienated contrary to the statute the heir of the alienor might enter upon the alience and defeat his estate. This it was hoped would prevent alienations of portions of the land to the damage of the interests of the lord. The law as to alienation in the case of lands held immediately of the king was different. The subject is very obscure, but it appears probable, as is asserted by Sir E. Coke in his notes on the passage of Magna Carta, that before the reign of Henry III there was no greater restraint on the alienation of lands held in fee of the Crown than in the case of lands held of a mesne lord; that about this time it was established (whether by this provision of Magna Carta, as Sir E. Coke thinks, or not is doubtful) that the lands held immediately of the king could not be alienated without incurring liability to a fine for a licence of alienation. It

1 See above, Chap. III. § 7.
3 Coke, 2 Inst. p. 66.
4 Ib. p. 66.
continued for a long time to be a question whether such an alienation of lands without licence was a cause of forfeiture to the Crown, or whether the king could only distain for the fine. This doubt was set at rest by 1 Edward III, st. 2, c. 12, by which it was provided that an alienation without licence of lands held of the king in chief should not be a cause of forfeiture, but a reasonable fine should be taken in the Chancery by due process. Henceforth for a licence of alienation by a tenant in capite the king was held to be entitled to a third part of the yearly value of the land, and for a fine upon alienation without licence to one year's value. These fines upon alienation were abolished by 12 Car. II, c. 29.

Bracton, lib. ii. cap. 19. fol. 45. Sed posset aliquis dicere quod ex hoc quod donarius uterius dat et transfert rem donatam ad alios, quod hoc facere non potest, quia per hoc amittit dominus servitium suum, quod quidem non est verum, salva pace et reverentia capitalium dominorum. Et generaliter verum est, quod donatorius rem et terram sibi datam donare poterit cui voluerit, nisi ad hoc specialiter agatur in possessione ne possit 2. Cum enim quis tenementum dederit, certum dat tenementum tali modo, ut certas consuetudines recipiat et certum servitium, secundum quod superius dictum est. Et unde de jure plus petere non poterit, si habuerit quod convenit, et sic tollat quod suum fuerit et vadat. Non enim fit donatio tali modo quod habeat custodiam terrae et haeredis maritagium, sed quod habeat homagium et servitium, sed cum homagium habuerit et tale debeatur forinsecum 3 servitium quod domino capitali, debeatur relevium, et custodia terrae, et maritagium haeredis cum evenerint, et quae sequuntur, forinsecum sicut servitium domini regis; nunquam tamen habebit dominus capitalis ista simul, sed unum istorum tantum, cum evenerit, aut relevium, aut custodiam, et haeredis maritagium. Et bene poterit esse quod unum istorum semper eveniet, et alium nunquam: et unde si dominus tantum relevium habeat, et teneat inde se contentum, quamvis plus valeant custodia et haeredis maritagium, et quia ubi quis tenetur ad duobus sub disjunctione, unum solvendo vel faciendo liberatur, et unde cum quis

1 See First Report on the Dignity of a Peer, pp. 398–400, and for the later history of the law of alienation of lands, see below, Chap. IV. § 5.

2 Unless there were some special provision against alienation at the time of the feoffment.

3 See above, § 11.
ALIENATION.

133

CH. III.
SECT. II.
§ 14.

capitalis dominus tenentem suum impedierit quod dare non possit, facit ei iuriam et disseisinam apertam, ex quo illum re sua et seissina uti non permittit. Tenens vero nullam facit iuriam domino suu ex tali donatione, quamvis damnum, cum ipse dominus habere possit relievin de suo feoffato et ejus hereditibus, et licet damnum facit, non tamen iuris suum erit praedicta ratione. . . .

Si tenens mens fecerit donationem, quaeritur cui faciat iuriam;—non domino, quia dominus habet quicquid pertinent ad ipsum, et tenementum obligatum et oneratum, quicquid dicatur, et ad quemcunque pervenerit. Item nec foellatus¹, quia nihil ad capitalem dominum quicunque foedum suum teneretur, cum tenens sit tenens sui quamvis per medium. Item si dicat quod injuste ingressus est foedum suum, dico non, quia non est foedum suum in dominico sed tenentis illius, et dominus nihil habet in foedo nisi servitium, et sic erit foedum tenentis in dominico, et foedum domini in servitio, et si dominus prohibuerit ne tenens faciat voluntatem suam de tenemento suo quod tenet in dominico, sic intrat dominus in tenementum tenentis sui et facit ei disseisinam; nisi modus vel conventio in ipsa donatione adjecta sibi inducat, cum quilibet possit modum et conditionem in donatione sua apponere, et legem quae semper observabitur².

Lib. ii. cap. 35. fol. 81. Item codem modo . . . . poterit homagium . . . . dissolvit et exinguit in persona tenentis et convallescere in persona alterius, ut si tenens, cum homagium fecerit domino suo, se demiserit ex toto de hereditate sua et alium foellaverit tenendum de domino capitali, et quo casu tenens absolvitur ab homaggio et exinguatur homagium, velit nolit dominus capitalis, et ineipit in persona foellati, qui obligatur propter tenementum quod tenet, quod est foedum domini capitalis³.

¹ ‘Neither does the new feoffee injure the lord’s rights.’
² By the time of Littleton (see sect. 360) this condition, imposing a restraint on alienation, was held illegal. A partial restraint however was still permitted. In Bracton’s time such restrictions were not uncommon, especially ‘viria religiosa et Juudaeis.’ See fol. 13.
³ This passage shows that it was possible before the Statute of Quia Emptores for a freehold tenant to grant away the whole of his land to another, so as to place the grantee exactly in his own position, and to substitute him as tenant to the superior lord. The Statute of Quia Emptores (see below, Chap. IV. § 5) applied only to the case of a grant of a portion of his land by the tenant.
§ 15. Differences of Freehold Estates in respect of their Durations. Estates of Freehold and Estates less than Freehold.

Conditional Gifts.

As the necessary connexion between the personal status of freedom and the holding of land comes to be of less importance, the word ‘freehold’ gradually loses its original signification, and is confined to what was before only one of the principal attributes of freehold tenure. When the rights over the land are given for a period the termination of which is not fixed or ascertained by a specified limit of time, the interest is a freehold interest. This is the usual sense of the word ‘freehold’ at the present day when opposed to ‘leasehold’ tenure. A trace of the older meaning remains in the opposition of ‘freehold’ to ‘copyhold’ tenure.¹

In the latter part of the following passages we find the groundwork of legal doctrines which attained afterwards to great complication and technicality, but which are comparatively plain as laid down by Bracton. These are—

(1) That a gift to A and his heirs is a donatio simplex et pura as opposed to a conditional gift, that under such a gift the donee A takes (to use the later expression) ‘by purchase,’ ex causa donationis, but that upon his death his heir takes by descent, that is, not directly from the donor, but as succeeding to and representing the donee. The effect of such a gift is therefore not to give one interest to A and another to his heir, but to give the whole interest to A, that is, an estate in fee simple descendible to his heirs general. In such a gift, as it is technically expressed, the word ‘heirs’ is a word of limitation, not of purchase. It is simply a mode of describing the nature and extent of the interest which is taken by A.

(2) If however other conditions or limitations are expressed in the gift, the estate given is, according to Bracton, to be modified thereby. Thus if an estate be given to a man and the heirs of his body, or to a man and his sons by a particular wife, the fee will in that case descend according to the modifications expressed in the gift; and if no such issue is born, the condition will not have been fulfilled, and the estate will revert to the donor. It does not appear from this passage within what limits this power of the donor to define interests to be taken under the grant was confined. Some of the instances given by Bracton would have been clearly inadmissible in later times. The law, as will be seen hereafter, took a more definite shape after the Statute De Donis Conditionalibus 1.

¹ See Chap. V. § 6.

(3) It appears from this passage that what were afterwards known as remainders and estates of future enjoyment were regarded by Bracton as conditional estates. For instance, a gift to A and the heirs of his body, or, if they fail, then to B and the heirs of his body, &c., would, according to Bracton, give to B an estate in expectancy, to come into effect or enjoyment either on A's dying without issue born, or on failure of A's issue. This would in after times have been called a remainder 2. Bracton speaks of it as a conditional gift. The prominence which Bracton gives to conditional estates is no doubt in a great measure owing to the full discussion of the nature and effect of conditions to be found in the sources of Roman law 3.

BRACHTON, lib. iv. cap. 28. fol. 207. Videndum est igitur in primis de generibus tenementorum. . . . Et sciendum quod liberum tenementum est id quod quis tenet sibi et haeredibus suis in feodo et haereditate, vel in feodo tantum sibi et haeredibus suis. Item ut liberum tenementum, sicut ad vitam tantum vel eodem modo ad tempus indeterminatum, abaque aliqua certa temporis praefinitione, scilicet, donec quid fiat vel non fiat, ut si dicatur, do tali donec ei providero. Liberum autem tenementum non potest dici alicujus quod quis tenet ad certum numerum annorum mensium vel dierum, licet ad terminum centum annorum, quae exceedit vitas hominum. Item liberum non potest dici tenementum alicujus, quod quis tenet ad voluntatem dominorum precario, quod tempestive et intempestive poterit revocari, sicut de anno in annum, et de die in diem.

1 See below, Chap. IV. § 3. 2 See below, Chap. V. § 3. 3 See especially Dig. xxxv. tit. 1. De Conditionibus et Demonstrationibus.

Lib. ii. cap. 5. fol. 13. Et sciendum quod multipliciter fit donatio; quandoque scilicet in foedo, quandoque in vita, quandoque ad foedi firmam, quandoque ad terminum vitae vel annorum. Si autem ad vitam qualitercumque, statim habet donatorius liberum tenementum, ut, si fuerit ejectus, recuperare posset per assisam novae discessinae, et poterit ille cui sic data fuit terra illa, alteri dare, vel in foedo, vel ad vitam si voluerit, sed revocari poterit donatio. Sed si ille, qui tenuerit ad vitam, sic et talibus verbis donationem fecerit de terra, quam ad vitam tenuerit, alieui, 'Do et concedo tali quicquid juris habeo in tali terra,' etsi qui dat liberum habeat tenementum, non tamen facit ei cui sic donatur liberum tenementum, quia dico, 'Do tibi jus meum,' hoc est terram talem ad vitam meam scilicet donatoris, non agitur ad vitam donatorii, et ideo donator licet liberum habeat tenementum, donatorio tamen per haec verba liberum tenementum facere non potuit, quia si dixisset, 'Do tibi talem rem in dominio vel in foedo,' hoc non esset jus suum, sed injuria. Jus autem suum hoc fuit, dare illud quod habuit, scilicet terram dare ad vitam suam, scilicet donatoris et non ad vitam accipientis, quia hoc esset injuriosum et non justum, et ex hoc liberum tenementum habere non potuit.

Lib. ii. cap. 6. fol. 17. Donationum alia divisio scilicet quod

---

1 For a gift in fee farm, see above, p. 104, n. 3.
2 That is, if tenant for life makes a gift of an estate of greater duration than he himself possesses, the freehold passes, but the estate granted may be avoided after the death of tenant for life by the person entitled in remainder or reversion. The powers of a tenant for life to sell or lease lands have been greatly enlarged by the 'Settled Land Act 1882,' 45 and 46 Vict. c. 38.
3 This, however, was not law in later times. By such a grant as that supposed in the text, the grantee would become tenant _per autre vie_, which is as much a freehold interest as is an ordinary estate for life. (See Blackstone, book ii. p. 120.) On the death of tenant _per autre vie_ in the lifetime of _cestui que vie_ (the person during whose life the estate is to last), formerly the lands became the property of the first occupant. If the grant had been made to a man and his heirs, the heir took during the residue of the life of _cestui que vie_, and was called the _special occupant_. Blackstone, ii. p. 259. The Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, followed by 14 Geo. II., c. 29, makes such estates subject to the will of tenant _per autre vie_, and provides that, if not so disposed of, and there is no special occupant, the estate is to devolve upon the executors or administrators, and be dealt with as personal property.
4 (Nor could he by any other words create a freehold interest in the donee), because if he had said, 'I give you such land in demesne or in fee,' this would be a wrongful act and not the exercise of a right.
CONDITIONAL GIFTS.

alia simplex et pura, alia conditionalis, alia sub modo, uni facta, vel pluribus successive. . . . . . Simplex autem et pura dici poterit ubi nulla est adjecta conditio nec modus; simpliciter enim dari dicitur, quod nullo adiecto datur. Ut si dicatur, 'Do tali tantam terram in villa tali pro homagio et servitio suo, habendam et tenendum eidem tali et haeredibus suis de me et haeredibus meis, redendo inde annuatim ipse et haeredes sui mihi et haeredibus meis tantum ad tales terminos pro omni servitio et consuetudine seculari et demanda,' ita quod certa sit res quae datur, et certa servitia et consuetudines quae domino debentur, licet incerta sunt alia quae tacite remittuntur, et ego et haeredes mei warrantizabimus, acquietabimus, et defendemus in perpetuum talem et haeredes suos versus omnes gentes per praedictum servitium,' et sic acquirit donatorius rem donatam ex causa donationis, et haeredes ejus post eum ex causa successionis', et nihil acquirit ex donatione facta antecessori, quia cum donatorio non est seofatus. . . . Item augere poterit donationem et facere alios quasi haeredes, licet revera haeredes non sunt, ut si dicat in donatione, 'habendum et tenendum tali et haeredibus suis, vel cui terram illam dare vel assignare voluerit,', et ego et haeredes mei warrantizabimus eidem tali et haeredibus suis, vel cui terram illam dare voluerit, vel assignare, et eorum haeredibus contra omnes gentes;' in quo caso si donatorius terram illam dederit vel assignaverit, si donatorius et haeredes sui defecerint, donator et haeredes sui incipiunt esse loco donatorii et haedrum suorum, et pro haerede donatorii erunt, quad warrantizandum assignatis et haeredibus eorum, per clausulam contentam in charta primi donatoris, quod quidem non esset nisi mentio fieret de assignatis in prima donatione. Sed quanudi primus donatorius superstes fuerit vel ejus haeredes, ipsi tenentur ad warrantiam, et non primus donator.

1 In the technical language of later times the word 'heirs' in such a gift is a word of limitation, not of purchase; i.e. it is merely descriptive of the estate which the grantee takes. A gift to A and his heirs is equivalent to a gift to A in fee. If the words 'of inheritance' be omitted, the estate granted is only for life.

2 This mention of assigns did not confer a right of alienation, which, as has been seen, existed already. In fact the phrase seems to have found its way into charters of footment from the habitual use of some similar expression in the old Anglo-Saxon charters; see above, pp. 14, 87. The practical effect, as Bracton points out immediately, seems to have been to extend the warranty of the donor for the protection of the assigns as well as the heirs of the donee. See Reeves, i. p. 310. Mr. Joshua Williams, Elements of Real Property, 14th ed. p. 43, appears to attach too great an importance to the use of the clause.
CH. III.  Item sicut ampliari possunt haeredes sicut praedictum est, ita coactari poterunt per modum donationis, quod omnes haeredes generaliter ad successionem non vocantur. Modus enim legem dat donationi, et modus tenendum est contra jus commune, et contra legem, quis modus et conventio vinceat legem, ut si dicatur; 'Do tali tantam terram cum pertinentiis in X. habendam et tenendum sibi et haeredibus suis quos de carne sua et uxore sibi desponsata proceratos habuerit.' . . . Quo casu, cum certi haeredes exprimmantur in donatione, videri poterit, quod tantum sit descensus ad ipsos haeredes communes per modum in donatione apposita, onnibus alios haeredibus suis a successione penturus exclusis, quia hoc voluit donator. Et unde si hujusmodi haeredes procerati fuerint, ipsi tantum vocantur ad successionem, et si taliter feoffatus aliquem ulterius inde feoffaverit, tenet feoffamentum, et haeredes tenetur ad warrantiam1, cum ipsi nihil clamare possunt nisi ex successione et descensu parentum, quamvis quibusdam videatur quod ipsi feoffati fuerint cum parentibus, quod non est verum2.
Si autem nullos tales haeredes habuerit, revertetur terra illa ad donatorem per conditionem tacitam, etiam si nulla fiat mentio in donatione quod revertatur, vel si expressa mentio in donatione habeatur: et ita erit si haeredes aliquando extiterint et defecer-rint3. Sed in primo casu ubi nullus extitit, semper erit res data donatorio liberum tenementum et non feodum. Item in secundo casu, quoniam inciperint haeredes esse, est liberum tenementum4, cum autem inciperint habere, incipit liberum tenementum esse feodum5, et cum desierint esse, desinit esse feodum, et iterum incipit esse liberum tenementum6, et ita nunquam

1 'The feoffment holds good and the heir of the alienor is bound to warranty.' See below, Chap. V. § 2.
2 For the same principle applies as above, that the words are only descriptive of the estate taken by the grantee. The instance just given is that of an estate which would in later times have been called an estate tail.
3 A reversion, as will be shown at length below, Chap. V. § 3 (1), is not expressly granted, but is that portion of the estate of the grantor which he retains when he has made a grant of a smaller or lesser interest.
4 That is, 'an estate for life,'
5 This is an instance of what Blackstone calls an estate upon condition precedent; ii. ch. 10. p. 154.
6 This, as will be seen in the next chapter, appears to have been ruled differently before 23 Edward I. The notion of a conditional estate had been by that time still further elaborated. The mere birth of issue was regarded as the happening of the condition so as to vest the fee in the donee, at all events so as to enable him to make a grant of the land in fee simple. The subsequent failure of issue to whom alone by the form of the ibidem aliud exactum nisi fuerit donatio pura, quia de reversione expressa nuncuam fiat mentio. Item esto quod sic dicatur in donatione, 'Do tali tantam terram cum pertinentiis etc. habendum et tenendum sibi et haeredibus suis si haeredes habuerit de corpore suo procreatos;' si tales haeredes extiterint, quamvis defecerint, generaliter vocandi sunt omnes et in infinitum, quia satisfactum est conditioni. Si autem nullus talis procreatus fuerit, semper erit res data liberum tenentum, et revertertur ad donatorem, omnibus aliis haeredibus exclusis, cum non sit conditioni satisfactum, et sic adjungitur conditio sub modo. Item fieri poterit donatio viro et uxori simul, et haeredibus uxoris tantum per modum donationis, et codem modo viro et uxori et haeredibus viri tantum. Item viro et gift the land could have descended would not affect the power of the donee to alienate after the fulfillment of the condition by the birth of issue. See preamble of De Donis, Chap. IV. § 3.

1 'Dower can never be claimed out of a conditional estate thus created, for there is always the chance of its reverting.' So long as an estate granted to a man and the heirs of his body was regarded as conditional merely, and as subject to reversion to the lord in the event of the donee having no issue or of the issue failing, the widow of the donee had no right to dower. When, however, the Statute De Donis converted these estates into estates of limited inheritance called 'estates tail,' the right to dower attached and could be claimed out of an estate tail as much as out of an estate in fee simple.

2 And hence a gift 'viro et haeredibus suis de corpore procreatis,' was held to imply a condition, and to be the gift of the fee conditional on the donee having issue of his body. Such a gift, however, differed from that in the text in not being descendible to heirs general.

3 Bracton here appears to confound two principles which as the law further developed were kept quite distinct. A person may make a disposition of his lands to A for a limited interest and give a further interest to another to come into enjoyment or possession after the death of the first donee. This is not to create a new heir, but to vest an estate immediately by gift in the second donee. It is the creation of what is called a remainder, a class of interest which will be further explained in Chap. V. § 3 (2). The person to whom a remainder is given takes directly from the person creating the remainder, and though the interest does not come into possession or enjoyment until after the termination of the interest of the first donee, the second donee does not in any sense take by devolution from the first donee. The first donee has a limited interest given to him which is terminated, and makes way for the enjoyment of the second donee. This case and the next are quite different from the other instances given by Bracton in the text, pp. 138, 129. Following apparently Anglo-Saxon custom (see above, pp. 14, 57, n. 3), it was held that in some cases the donor could restrict the devolution of the inheritance to certain persons or classes of persons. In the later development of the CH. III. uxori et haeredibus communibus si tales extiterint, vel si non extiterint tunc ejus haeredibus qui alium supervixerit. . . .

§ 15. Item poterit pluribus fieri donatio per modum simul et successive; ut si quis plures habebat filios, et sic fecerit primogenito donationem et dicat, ‘Do A primogenito filio meo tantam terram etc. habendum et tenendum sibi et haeredibus suis de corpore su procreatis, et si tales haeredes non habuerit, vel habuerit et defecerint, tunc terram illum do B filio meo postgenito1; et volo quod terra ad ipsum B revertatur habendum et tenendum sibi et haeredibus suis quos de corpore suo procreatos habuerit, et si nullos tales habuerit, vel si habuerit et defecerint, tunc volo et concedo pro me et haeredibus meis quod praedicta terra revertatur ad C tertium filium meum, habendum et tenendum sibi et haeredibus suis quos de corpore suo procreatos habuerit, et sic de pluribus. Et si praedicti A B C sine talibus haere-dibus de corpore suo procreatis decesserint, tunc volo quod praedicta terra revertatur ad me et ad alios haeredes meos,’ quod quidem fieret sine expressione per tacitam conditionem, nisi donator alium inde ordinaret. Item si largius fiat donatio, ut si dicatur, ‘Do tibi tantum terrae etc. habendum et tenendum ibili et haeredibus tuis vel cui dare vel assignare in vita vel in morte legare volueris,’ valet donatio propter voluntatem et consensum donatoris, quamvis contra legem terrae fieri videatur, et unde si legatarius primam habuerit seisinam, si haeres petat per assecurum; legatarius contra assecurum competentem habebit exceptionem de modo donationis: si autem legatarius extra seisinam petat ex causa testamentaria in foro ecclesiastico, ob-statit ei regia prohibitio, ne judices ecclesiastici judicarent, quis non habent jurisdictionem nec coercionem ad judicium suum exequendum. Si autem in foro seculari agere voluerit, quamvis hoc sit inauditum, bene poterit per breve formatum, cum possit quis renunciare iis quae pro se et suis fuerint introducta, sine praesidio aliorum2. . . . .

law, and probably in the time of Bracton, the application of this principle was confined to a gift to a man and his issue, technically called ‘heirs of his body,’ either generally, or of one sex, or to the issue by a particular wife.
In this case, unlike the former, the inheritance is vested in the donee, and the issue take not directly from the donor, but by devolution from the donee.

1 This would in later times have been called a vested remainder in tail.
See Chap. V, § 3 (2).

2 ‘Hence if the legatee be the first in obtaining the seisin and then the heir bring the assize, the legatee will be able to meet the action by a valid plea setting up the limitations of the gift. If however the legatee be not able CONDITIONAL GIFTS.

141

CH. III.

Sect. II.

§ 15.

Item conditionum alia expressa et fit verbis negativis, ut si dicatur, ‘Si Titius haeres non sit, tu haeres esto!’ vel ‘Si tu haereditem de corpore tuo non haberis, tunc terra sic data revertatur ad tales,’ unum vel plures, simul vel successive.

Item poterit conditio impedire descessum ad proprios haeredes contra jus commune, ut si dicam, ‘concedo tibi tantum terrae ad terminum x annorum, et post terminum revertatur ad me terra illa, et si infra terminum illorum x annorum decessero, concedo pro me et haeredibus meis quod terra illa tibi remaneat ad vitam tuam vel in feodo,’ et sic facit conditio liberum tenementum et feodum, et tollit conditio haeredibus assisam mortis antecessoris, quia si illi prima facie habeant directam actionem, firmarius tamen habebit ex conventione exceptionem." Item to obtain possession, and asserts his claim by proceedings on the will in the Ecclesiastical Court, he will be met by the king’s prohibition prohibiting the ecclesiastical judges from determining the suit, for they have no jurisdiction in such matters, nor have they any means of enforcing their judgments. If however he should desire to bring his action in the temporal Courts, though there is no precedent for such a proceeding, he might well do so by means of a special writ, since it was open to the testator to waive the benefit of a rule of law introduced for the benefit of himself or his heirs, provided that he does so without prejudice to others." In this remarkable passage Bracton seems to suggest two modes by which the restriction upon the old Anglo-Saxon power of disposing of interests in lands by will might be evaded. Neither of these modes seems to have been ever adopted or recognised by the Courts of Common Law. A devise of lands was not recognised as conveying any legal interest to the devisee till after the legislation of Henry VIII. See Chap. VIII. As to the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in regard to legacies, see Blackstone, ii. 513. iii. 65. A writ of prohibition was the proper mode of preventing a Court exceeding the bounds of its jurisdiction. Glanvill (lib. xiii. c. 21) gives a specimen of a writ of prohibition addressed to a plaintiff in the Ecclesiastical Court: ‘Rex vicecomiti salutem. Prohibe R. ne sequatur placitum in curia Christianitatis quod est inter N. et ipsum de laico feodo ipius R. in villa ipsa unde ipse queritur quod praefatus N. inde eum traxit in curia Christianitatis coram judicibus illius.’

1 This instance is taken almost verbatim from the Digest, De Vulgari et Pupillari Substitutione, xxviii. tit. vi. 1, and is not applicable to the law at the time of Bracton, the maxim being, ‘Solus Deus haeredem facere potest non homo.’

2 ‘The tenant for years will be able to plead the grant in bar to an assise of novel disseisin.’ Notice the accurate use of the term ‘exceptio’ in the sense employed by the Roman lawyers. ‘Conventio’ is here used, somewhat inaccurately, to express a conditional grant. This grant of the fee would not have been held good in later times, for it would in effect have amounted to a contingent remainder without any particular estate of freehold to support it: see below, Chap. V. § 3 (2).
CH. III.

sect. ii.

§ 15. quod fuit ab initio liberum tenementum et ad vitam, per conventionem poterit mutari in terminum, ut si aliquis concedat alteri terram ad vitam, fieri poterit inter eos conditio, quod si tenens infra certum terminum obierit, quod haeredes tenentis vel assignati vel sui executores possunt terram sic datam tenere usque ad certum terminum, post mortem ipsius tenentis, et ita facit conditio de termino liberum tenementum, et e contrario, et dat exceptionem contra veros dominos et eorum haeredes.

. . . . . Item dat exceptionem creditorum contra debitores verum dominum et haeredes ejus, si inter eos convenerit ab initio, quod si pecunia suo die solutum non fuerit, quod terra in vadium data remanet creditorum et suis haeredibus, ut infra de assisa mortis antecessoris de haerede Johannis Dacy.

The life interest which a husband has in certain events in the lands of which his wife was in her lifetime actually seised 2 for an estate of inheritance is called an estate by the curtesy of England. In order to give the husband title as tenant by the curtesy the wife must have had by him issue born alive capable of inheriting the lands 3. The origin of the name is doubtful. It appears to be connected with curia 4, and to have reference either to the attendance of the husband as tenant of the lands at the lord’s court, or to mean simply that under the circumstances mentioned the husband is acknowledged tenant by the Courts of England 5, the equivalent Latin expression being tenens per legem Angliae. The doubt referred to in the text as being entertained by Stephanus de Segreve is a curious instance of the discussion and criticism to which rules of law were subjected at this time 6.

1 See below, Chap. V. § 5 (2). The reference is to the report of some case.
2 As to what amounts to an actual selain, see Coke upon Littleton, 29 a.
3 See Littleton, sect. 25. In gavelkind lands a man may be tenant by the curtesy without having had any issue.
4 In ancient Scotch law the expression is ‘curialitas.’
5 As Gunderman (Englisches Privatrecht, p. 167) points out, this species of interest was not, as Littleton (sect. 35) asserts, peculiar to England, but is found also in France and Germany.
6 For further details as to the incidents of tenancy by the curtesy, see Blackstone, Book ii. p. 176.
§ 17. Terms of Years.

In the following passage Bracton speaks of estates less than freehold. The characteristic of this class of interests in land is that the estate is sure to come to an end on the lapse of some specified time, however remote that time may be. The passage is very remarkable, as noting the precise point at which terms of years came to be recognised as estates in land.

1 See above, p. 87, n. 4.
2 This is characteristically put by Bracton as an essential condition. In later times crying was properly regarded as evidence, but not as necessarily the only evidence, of the child being born alive. It was usual in early times to evade the extreme difficulty which was experienced in adopting modes of deciding disputed facts by fixing on some one fact as the sole evidence of the thing to be proved. On the other hand, some one fact was often regarded as a conclusive index of the truth or falsehood of matter in dispute, admitting of no contradiction.
3 The law was settled in accordance with the opinion of Stephanus de Segrave by the Statute of Westminster II, 13 Edward I, cap. 1. It was held that the Statute had made a change in the common law (Year Book, 30 Edward I, p. 126).
4 It should be observed that by the word ‘term’ is meant not only the period during which the interest lasts, but the interest or estate itself.
5 The distinguishing characteristic of an estate in lands is that it consists of a collection of rights in rem, or rights available against all the world, as
Before the change here mentioned the termor or lessee had no interest which the law would protect against third persons, nor indeed against the lessor, unless the interest in the lands rested on a conventio, or covenant by deed. It had been the practice from very early times to grant leases by deed \(^1\), and in such a case, if the lessor wrongfully ejected the lessee, the lessee had his remedy by action on the covenant (per breve de conventione), as in the case of any other covenant under seal. The new writ which was introduced, as stated in this passage, afforded the lessee a remedy against his lord, whether the lease was by deed or not; and also gave him a right to protection against ejectment by a third person, and probably an additional remedy, by enabling the lessee to recover possession of the land, and not merely damages for breach of covenant\(^2\). This was called the writ of ejectio firmae; a proceeding which, by a series of fictions (now abolished), was extended, till, in the form of the action of ejectment, it became the appropriate means of asserting the right to the possession of land under whatever title, and took its place as the statutory substitute for all the forms of real actions.

Thus the interest of the termor or lessee for years, instead of resting at best upon a covenant with his lessor, and therefore being enforceable only as against him, became a right of distinct from the other great class of rights, jura in personam, which are only available against some particular or determinate person or persons; e.g. rights arising from contract. See Austin, i, pp. 380–389, and below, Appendix to Part I, § 1. A more apt illustration of the distinction between rights in personam and rights in rem than that contained in the following passage cannot be found.

\(^1\) See Madox, Formulae Anglicorum, Preliminary Dissertation, xx; Fornas, Nos. cxxxv, cxx, cxxi, cxxxii; and see above, p. 49.

\(^2\) In the following passage of Bracton the recovery of the possession of the land is mentioned as if it were part of the extended remedy provided by the council. If so, the importance of the passage in the history of the recognition of leasehold interests is much increased. In later times it was doubted whether the judgment was not for damages merely, and not for the recovery of the term. It was, however, finally settled that in 'ejectio firmae' the term itself could be recovered. See Fitzherbert, Natura Brevium, 145 m; Selwyn's Nisi Prius, Ejectment, p. 615; Doe d. Poole v. Errington, 1 Adolphus and Ellis, 736.
property which could be enforced against any wrong-doer, by a remedy analogous to that provided for a wrongful ouster of a freeholder from his possession. Thus these interests became estates or rights of property in land. There was however an important difference in the devolution of the estate on the death of the lessee. Under the earlier law, the persons, who, upon the death of the lessee within the term, would have been entitled to the benefit of the covenant, were the executors or administrators of the deceased, and therefore it was natural that this new estate or interest should descend, not to the heir-at-law, but to the personal representatives, the executors or administrators, of the lessee. Thus leasehold interests came to be classed with personal and not with real property 1.

Bractox, lib. ii, cap. 9, fol. 27. Si autem fiat donatio ad terminus annorum quamvis longissimum, qui excedat vitas hominum, tamen ex hoc non habeat donatorius liberum tenementum, cum terminus annorum certus sit et determinatus, et terminus vitae incertus, et quia, licet nihil certius sit morte, nihil tamen incertius est hora mortis. Poterit etiam quis terram aliqui concedere ad terminum annorum, et illæ cæsionem infra terminum illum alteri dare, vel eidem in feodo, et sic mutare unam possessionem in aliam, si firmariam foellaverit 4. Si autem alium, utraque possessione durat, quis sese compatiuntur terminus et feoffamentum de cadem terra, quia ibi sunt diversa iura, ad feoffatum vero pertinent proprietas foeldi et liberum tenementum, firmarius vero nihil sibi vindicare poterit nisi usum fructuum, silicet quod libere uti possit et sine impedimento foellati perci piere usum fructuum 5. Item dare poterit quis aliqui terram ad voluntatem suam, et quandiu ei placuerit de termino in terminum, et de anno in annum, et in quo

1 See as to the further history of terms of years, below, Chap. V. § 1.
2 A man may make a lease of his land to another for a term of years, and within that term grant the freehold to a third person or to the lessee. This latter proceeding would be technically called ‘releasing’ the reversion.
As to the conveyance by lease and release, see below, Chap. V. § 3 (1), and Chap. VII.
3 If the freeholder enfeoffs a third person of the land already held by the lessee, the possession of the lessee or termor will co-exist with the seisin of the freeholder. The lessee has the use of the soil, and the right to cultivate it and reap its produce, and for this purpose has exclusive possession. This however does not amount to seisin (see above, pp. 48, n. 4, 92), which must reside elsewhere, either in the lessor or in his feoffor.
CH. III. sect. ii. § 17.

Lib. iv. cap. 36. fol. 220. Nunc dicendum si quis ejiciatur de usufructu vel usu et habitatione alicujus tenementi quod tenuerit ad terminum amorum ante terminum suum. Poterit enim quis in uno et eodem tenemento habere liberum tenementum et alius usum fructum et usum et habitationem. Solent alicuando tales, cum ejecti essent infra terminum suum, perquirere sibi per breve de conventione. Sed quia tale breve locum habere non potuit inter aliquas personas, nisi tantum inter illum qui ad firmam tradidit et ad terminum, et illum qui ceperit, nec alios obligare potest obligatio conventionis, et etiam quia inter tales personas vix vel non sine difficultate potuit terminari negotium, de consilio curiae provisum est firmario contra quoscunque dejectores per tale breve:

' Rex Vicecomiti salutem, Praecepte A quod juste et sine dilatione reddat B tantum terrae cum pertinentiis in tali villa quam idem A qui dimisit etc.' Vel sic, 'Si talis fecerit te securnum etc., ut

1 These terms are borrowed from the Roman lawyers. See Justinian's Institutes, ii. Titt. iv. v. The Roman conception of the interest is very analogous to that of English law; it implied the right of temporarily using a thing of which some other person was the dominus in such a way as not to interfere with his ultimate or reversionary right.

2 'The usual remedy open to such lessees, when they are ejected before the expiration of their term, is by action of covenant. But insomuch as this action was not available except as between lessor and lessee, and third persons could not be bound by the covenant, and even as between lessor and lessee it was an insufficient and inconvenient mode of determining the matter, by the advice of the Curia Regis a remedy was provided which the farmer could avail himself of as against any person whatsoever who should turn him out of possession. This was by means of the following writ: 'The king to the sheriff greeting. Command A that he duly and without delay do restore to B so much land with the appurtenances in such a villa, from which the said A who demised the land to B (has wrongfully ejected him, etc.).' Or thus: 'If A gives proper security, summon B to show cause why he ejects and keeps ejected A from so much land with the appurtenances which C demised to A for a term which is not yet passed, and within the said term the said C sold the land to B, by reason of which sale the said B afterwards ejected A from the said land as he saith, etc.' And if such a writ is available against a stranger on account of a sale to him, much more is it available against the lord himself who demised, and without reason ejected the lessee, than against a stranger who had some sort of reason for what he did if by reason of the sale made to him he ejected the farmer, or if on any other ground any one other than the original lessor has ejected the lessee. In that case the writ speaks of 'the land which C of N demised for a term which has not yet expired, within which term the aforesaid A or C wrongfully ejected B,' etc.
infra, ostensurus quare deforceat tali tantum terrae cum pertinen-tiis, in tali villa, quod talis dimisit ipsi tali ad terminum qui nondum praeterit, infra quem terminum praecipius tali illud vendidit tali, occasione cujus venditionis ipse talis postmodum talem de praedicta terra ejecit ut dicit. Et habes ibi etc.
Teste etc.’ Et si late breve competat contra extraneum propter venditionem, multo fortius competat contra ipsum dominum qui dimisit et sine causa ejecit, quam contra extraneum qui causam habuit qualem qualem, si occasione venditionis ei factae venditor firmarium ejecit, vel aliter si alius ejecerit quam ille qui dimisit; et tunc sic, ‘Quam C de N ei dimisit ad terminum qui nondum praeterit, infra quem terminum praecipius A vel praecipius C ipsum B de eadem terra vel firma sua injuste ejecit ut dicit etc.’
... Non magis poterit aliqua firmarium ejicere de firma sua quam tenentem aliquem de libero tenemento suo. Et unde si ille ejecerit qui tradidit, seisisam\(^1\) restituet cum dannis, quia talis restitutio non multum differt a disseisina. Si autem alius quem qui tradidit ejecerit; si hoc fecerit cuna auctoritate et voluntate tradentis, uterque tenetur hoc judicio, unus propter factum et alius propter auctoritatem. Si autem sine voluntate, tunc tenetur ejec-trumque tam domino proprietatis quam firmario, firmario per istud breve, domino proprietatis per assisam novae disseisinae, ut unus rehabeat terminum cum dannis, et alius liberum tenementum sum sine dannis. Si autem dominus proprietatis tenementum ad firmam traditum alii quidem dederit in dominico tenendum, seisisam ei facer poterit salvo firmario termino suo\(^4\). Poterit enim cum inducere in seissiam vacuam, quantum ad ipsum et suus, et attornare\(^3\) ei firmarium et servitium suum, dum tamen foedatus non utatur, nec expletia capiat, maxime nec firmarium impedit uti, nect ipsum ejiciat.

§ 18. Servitudes. (Easements and Profits.)

(1) In General.

The branch of our law which relates to the class of rights over land belonging to another (jura in alio solo), called

\(^1\) ‘Seisin’ is here used improperly, as simply equivalent to possession.
\(^2\) That is, if the freeholder wishes to convey the freehold to another, he can effect this notwithstanding the interest of the lessee. He can convey the reversion by ‘grant,’ or he can make livery of seisin and cause the farmer to attorn to the fooffee. See below, Chap. V. § 1.
\(^3\) On the necessity of attornment on the part of the termor to complete the alienation of the freehold, see below, Chap. V. § 3 (1).
servitudes, is derived mainly from the Roman system. The principles here laid down by Bracton are in most cases taken direct from Roman sources, and, speaking generally, are still recognised as the basis of the law on this subject.

The main characteristic of the rights in question is that they are either rights of using the land of another for certain defined and limited purposes, as, for instance, of riding or driving cattle across it; or rights of restraining the owner from using his land in certain definite ways, for example, the owner of a house with ancient windows has a right to prevent any owner of adjoining land doing anything upon his soil which may obstruct the access of light and air to the ancient window. The former class are called positive, the latter negative servitudes. It is convenient, though perhaps not strictly accurate, to speak of both classes as rights of use exercised over the land of another.

If the purposes for which the land of another are used merely tend to the more convenient enjoyment of another piece of land, the right is called an easement; if the right is to take a portion of the soil or the produce of the soil of another, the right is called a profit à prendre.

Bracton points out clearly the distinction between rights over the land of another which are appurtenant, or rights which are exercised over tenement B (called the praedium serviens) by the successive owners of tenement A (praedium dominans) as and being such owners,—and rights in gross, or rights which are not attached to the ownership of any piece of land other than that over which the rights are exercised.

1 It appears to be the more correct view to confine the expression ‘easement’ to rights appurtenant to land. Whether there can be an easement properly so called not so appurtenant is a question which has been much discussed, but apparently never finally settled. (See Gale on Easements, 4th ed., p. 12, note d.) Such rights at all events partake of the nature of easements as far as regards their mode of creation, which must be by deed (Bird v. Higginson, 6 Adolphus and Ellis, 824; Wood v. Leadbetter, 13 Meezen and Welsby, 838). Probably however they do not possess the principal characteristic of an easement properly so called—the capacity of being asserted as against third parties. They are rights in personam, not Again, he points out correctly that the essence of the right consists in the power of restraining the owner of the servient tenement (that over which the rights are exercised) from putting into force his full rights of doing as he pleases with the land. He may not so use his land as to obstruct my right of passage over it, or of having water from his stream. His rights are however only limited by positive duties; that is, by certain duties imposed by known rules of law. User of land which causes damage to a neighbour does not necessarily amount to legal injury. The principles and the illustrations here given by Bracton are in the main applicable to the law at the present day.

With regard to the origin of servitudes, or the modes in which they may be acquired, Bracton correctly lays down the two modes which have always been recognised, grant (dominorum constitutio) and prescription (usuus). Feoffment with livery was confined to granting freehold estates over land. It was not applicable to the class of rights over land under consideration. Hence the other principal mode of creating rights was adopted, namely writing under seal, and it became a principle that for the creation of a servitude (easement or profit) a grant by deed was necessary.

The other mode of acquiring servitudes is, according to Bracton, per longum usum continuum et pacificum. The user must have been as of right, not violent, or clandestine, or permissive. These principles, borrowed from the Romans, took root in our law. Only, as time went on, the notion of prescription^1^ underwent a change. Long enjoyment of a

---

^1^ It is important to bear in mind the distinction between local or particular custom and prescription. A local custom is where within the limits and subject to the restrictions recognised by the law (see Blackstone, i. p. 76) a practice has prevailed time out of mind in a particular district, creating certain special rights and duties peculiar to the dwellers in that district. Prescription is where a person possesses a right by reason of the fact of long and right was not considered, as was the case in the Roman system, and as Bracton's language here implies, as itself a positive mode of acquisition, but only as evidence that at some period the owner of the soil had created the right in question by a lost or forgotten deed. So far was this carried that, on uninterrupted enjoyment, as of right, either by himself and his ancestors, or by himself and his predecessors in title (i.e. those who have preceded him in the ownership of the land in respect of which the right is claimed, and whose rights have by alienation or devolution become vested in him). See Blackstone, ii. p. 263.

1 Blackstone, ii. 265. This doctrine, arising from what at the present day we may venture to pronounce false historical notions, has produced a curious rule with regard to 'profits.' According to the legal theory, every profits, such for instance as a right of pasture on the lord's waste, must have originated in a grant by the lord. Therefore it can only be claimed by persons who are capable of taking by grant. Therefore it cannot be claimed, in virtue of a local custom or otherwise, by an indefinite body, such for instance as the inhabitants of a parish who are not a corporation (see Lord Hatherley’s observations in Warrick v. Queen's College, Oxford, Law Reports, 6 Chancery Appeals, p. 724; and compare Goodman v. Mayor of Saltash, Law Reports, 7 Appeal Cases, 633). In many places as a fact the inhabitants have enjoyed and exercised such quasi rights of pasturage. And there can be little doubt that the practice has descended from very early times, and was in fact a recognised right in the community inhabiting the district before the idea arose that the soil was the property of the lord. To the same origin doubtless must be referred most of the rights of a similar character enjoyed by freeholders and copyholders. These rights did not as a fact originate in a grant, they were recognised at a time before the notion of the sole ownership of the lord came into existence; but because of the false historical theory that such rights must have been created by grant, it has become an established rule in our law that inhabitants, unlike freehold or copyhold tenants, cannot as such claim profits in alieno solo, and that a custom to exercise such alleged rights is invalid. Where the practice has been to exercise the privilege as of right from time immemorial, great practical injustice is often done by the operation of this rule of law. That inhabitants as such could not claim a right of common was formally decided in Gateward's case (6 Coke's Reports, 59 b) in 4 James I. It appears from the Act, 43 Eliz. c. 11, that such rights were at that time recognised, and that an Act of Parliament was thought necessary for their extinguishment (see Elton on Commons, p. 151). The Act provides for the reclamation of certain marshes wherein 'divers have common by prescription by reason of their residence and inhabitance, which kynde of commons nor their interest therein can by the common law be extinguished or granted to bynde others which should have inhabite there afterwarde' (Statutes of the Realm, iv. 977). The inference would seem to be that the established rule of law is in fact a creation of the Elizabethan lawyers. See above, p. 8, note 1. Somewhat inconsistently, however, rights in the nature proof of enjoyment for a considerable period, juries were directed to find that a grant had been made and lost although distinct proof might be given that the enjoyment had originated in usurpation before that period. 1 A new species of prescription was introduced by the Prescription Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV, c. 71. By that Act exercise and enjoyment of the easement or profit for definite periods limited by the Act have the effect of creating an indefeasible title to the right in question. 2

These rights were deemed so far to be of the nature of freehold rights as that the appropriate remedy for disturbance of their enjoyment was by the Assize of Novel Disceisin.

Bracton, lib. iv. cap. 37. fol. 220. Pertinent enim ad liberum tenementum jura sicut et corpora, 3 jura sive servitutes diversis respectibus. Jura autem sive libertates dici poterunt ratione tenementorum, quibus debentur. Servitutes vero ratione tenementorum a quibus debentur; et semper consistunt in alieno et non in proprio, quia nemini servire potest suus fundus proprius; et nulius hujusmodi servitutes constituere potest nisi ille qui fundum habet et tenementum, quia praediorum aliud liberum aliud servitutis suppositum. Liberum dici poterit quod in nullo tenetur vel a-stringitur praediiis vicinorum. Si autem tenetur, dicitur servitutis suppositum quod prius fuerat liberum, et hoc sive tenetur praedio sive tenemento alieno de voluntate et constitutione dominorum, of easements are still recognised as capable of resting on local custom. For example, a custom for the inhabitants of a particular district to play lawful games on a certain piece of land was upheld in Fitch v. Rawlings, 2 Henry Blackstone, 393; and a custom to hold horse-races on a particular day on a moor, in Mounsey v. Ismay, 1 Hurlstone and Colman, p. 729. Doubtless the recognition of profits as being claimable by custom would have been more detrimental to the interests of lords of manors than the recognition of mere easements.

1 See Gale on Easements, p. 149. 2 See Sections 1–3.
3 See Justiniun’s Institutes, ii. tit. 2; and for the distinction between corporeal and incorporeal things, see below, Appendix to Part I, § 1 (11).
4 And hence the expressions ‘servient tenement,’ ‘dominant tenement’ have taken root in our law to express respectively the land over which the right is exercised, and the land to the ownership of which the right is attached.
5 ‘Nulli res sua servit.’ Dig. lib. viii. tit. ii. 26.

Compare Dig. lib. viii. tit. iv. 1. § 1: ‘Ideo autem hae servitutes praediorum appellantur quia sine praeda constitui non possunt.’
vel propter servitium certum, vel propter vicinitatem, quia, si fuerit incertum, ut si quis plus dederit aliquando minus, haec esset potius emptio herbagii quam pastura, et hoc erit potius personale quam praediale. Item codem modo si quis temporibus ad voluntatem suam. Item herbagium dici poterit si cui concedatur, quia non habet liberum tenementum ad quod pertinere possit. Et talis dici poterit constitutio qua domus domui, rus ruri, fundus fundo, tenementum tenemento subiungatur, et non tantum personae per se vel tenementum per se, sed utereque simul tam tenementum quam personae. Et ita pertinent servitutes aliqui fundo ex constitutione sive ex impositione de voluntate dominorum. Item pertinenti poterunt sine constitutione per longum usum continuum et pacificum et non interruptum per aliquod impedimentum contrarium ex patientia inter praesentes, quae trahitur ad consensus. Et unde licet servitutes expresse non imponatur nec constitutur de voluntate dominorum, tamen si quis fuerit cessare per aliquod tempus pacifico sine aliqua interruptione nec vi nec clam nec precario, quod idem est quod de gratia, ad minus sine judicio

1 'If the right be uncertain, for instance if at one time the owner grant a person more pasture, at another less, this would be rather a purchase of the feed, than a right of common of pasture, and would be a right in gross rather than one appurtenant to the land.' Bracton is here distinguishing what would in later times have been called rights appurtenant, or rights attached to and enjoyed by the successive owners of a dominant tenement, from rights in gross; see above, p. 148.

2 The rule of Roman law was, as laid down by Ulpian (Dig. lib. xiii. tit. iii. 10. § 1), 'Hoc jure utinam ut servitutes per se sese quam longo tempore capi possint, cum ecclesiae possint.' That is, where a house (or other immovable thing) which has been acquired by usucapio has attached to it certain rights over the property of another, these servitudes are acquired together with the house, etc. But no servitude per se can be acquired by long user. The law appears to have been different in Cicero's time, but the possibility of acquiring servitudes by usucapio was abolished as inconsistent with the true principles of law by the Lex Scribonia, see Poethier, Dig. lib. xiii. vii. Compare Dig. lib. xiii. tit. i. 43. § 1: 'Incorporales res traditionem et usucapionem non recipere manifestum est.' The doctrines of Roman law as to the acquisition of rights of ownership over things are here adapted by Bracton to the acquisition of rights in re aliena. This took root in our law. The rights in question can be acquired by prescription. Rights of ownership over things cannot be so acquired, but the remedies (and now the rights, 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 27. s. 34) of the true owner are extinguished by the lapse of a defined period.

3 See Dig. lib. xiii. tit. xxiv. 1. 'Prætor ait, "Quod vi aut clam factum est, qua de re agitur, id quum experiendi potestas est restitua."' Compare xiii. tit. ii. 6.

4 'Alt Prætor, "Quod precario ab illo habes, aut dolo male fecisti ut de-Servitudes.

Disseisiri non potest; quia si violencia adhibeat, nunquam erit jus disseisiteris propter temporis diuturnitatem, nisi per negligentiam ipsius qui vinum patitur ex longa et pacifica et continua possessione inter praesentes, secus inter absentes, et talis servitudo multipliciter poterit interrumpi. Si autem fuerit seissina clandestina scilicet in absentia dominorum, vel illis ignorantibus, et si scirent essent prohibituri, licet hoc fiat de consensu vel dissimulatione bailiuvorum, valere non debet. Si autem precario fuerit et de gratia, quae tempestive revocari possit et intempestive, ex longo tempore non acquiritur jus, nec in casu proximo notato. Illud autem, quod de gratia est, ad voluntatem concedentis revocari poterit quocumque tempore, quod quidem non est in commodato. Potest etiam servitus ita constitui in proprio, ne liceat domino fundi pascere in suo proprio, et sic constituitur servitus in fundo alieno, aliquando ab homine, aliquando ex patientia et usu. Et eodem modo imponitur quandoque a jure et nec ab homine nec ab usu, scilicet, ne quis faciat in proprio per quod damnum vel nocentum eveniat vicino. Necentum enim poterit esse iustum, et poterit esse injuriosum. Injuriosum ubi quis fecerit aliquod in suo iuste contra legem vel contra constitutionem prohibitus a jure. Si autem prohiberit a jure non possess ne faciat, licet nocentum faciat et damnosum, tamen non erit injuriosum, licetum est enim unicumque factere in suo quod damnum injuriosum sines habere, quia de re agitur id illi restitutum. Compare the rule of our law that continued enjoyment in order to give a title must be 'as of right,' 2 and 3 Will. IV, c. 71.

1 Compare the Institutes of Justinian, lib. ii. tit. vii, pr. 'Immobiles [res] . . . inter praesentes decemnio, inter absentes viginti annis [usuumipiantur].'

2 The interruption must be of the right itself, not of the actual enjoyment. Interruption of the right destroys the prescription or custom (see Blackstone, l. 77); interruption of the actual enjoyment or user, however long continued, operates as some evidence that the right has been abandoned or released.

3 This is a correct description of 'negative' easements, where one person has, as owner of tenement A, the right to restrain the owner of tenement B from putting his land to uses which would, but for this special right, be legitimate. For example, A who has a house with an ancient window overlooking B's land, can prevent B from building on his land so as to obstruct the access of light and air to the window. Compare Dig. lib. viii, tit. i. 15: 'Servitutum non ea natura est, ut aliquid faciat quis; veluti viridaria tollat, aut amoeniorem prospectum praestet, aut in hoc ut in suo pingat; sed ut aliquid patiatur aut non faciat.'

4 This however is not properly a servitude at all, but part of the general rights attached to the possession of property. For the distinction between dominium and servitus see Austin, vol. ii, lect. xlviii.
non eveniet vicino, ut si quis in fundo proprio construat aliquod melendinum, et sectam suam et aliorum vicinorum subtrahat vicino, facit vicino damnun et non injuriam, cum a lege vel a constitutione prohibitor non sit ne melendinum habeat vel construat. Item a jure imponitur servitus prae dio vicinorum, scilicet ne quis stagnum suum altius tollat per quod tenementum vicini submergatur. Item ne faciat fossam in suo per quam aquam vicini diverat, vel per quod ad alveum suum pristinum reverti non possit in toto vel in parte. Item ne quid faciat in suo quo minus vicinum suus omnino uti possit servitute imposito vel concessa, vel quo minus commode utatur loco, tempore, numero vel genere, qualitate vel quantitate. Et non refert utrum hoc omnino fecerit vel quod tantundem valeat: ut si quis habuerit jus eundi per fundum alienum, non solum facit disseisinam si viam obstruat, sed si ire non permittat omnino commode vel ad usum debitum. Item si reficere viam non permitat, ad viam enim pertinet rectificio. Item eodem modo si omnino aquan non diverat, sed fossam faciat vel purgare non permitat; quia ad aquae ductum pertinet purgatio, sicut ad viam pertinet rectificio. Item licet omnino non impediat, si fecerit tamen quo minus commode, facit disseisinam, ut si communiam habeat in certo loco cum libero et competenti ingressu et egressu, faciat quis fossatum et bayam, murum vel pollacium, per quod oportet me ire per circuitum, ubi prius ingressum sum per compendium, salvo tamen vicino jure suo si recenter ad queredam ejus qui injuriam passus est quod suum fuerit exequatur . . . Si autem debitum modum excedat quis, incontinenti repelli poterit, post tempus vero non nisi cum causae cognitio; et sic, ut praedictum est, poterit quis habere servitutem in fundo alieno et uti, nisi prohibeatur ex justa causa. Jura siquidem quae quis in fundo alieno habere poterit, infinita sunt.

1 Bracton here correctly draws the distinction between damnun—mere damage or harm,—and injuriam—an illegal act causing damage. Obstructing a beautiful prospect which I have always enjoyed from the windows of my house is, in the view of English law, a mere damnun; diminishing by obstruction the quantity of light and air which I receive through ancient windows is injuriam. Sic utero tuo ut alienum non laedas' is said to be the maxim of our law. As Mr. Austin points out (ii. p. 829), if by 'laedas' is meant mere damage, the maxim is untrue as a legal proposition; if it means 'injury,' it tells us nothing, as it affords no explanation of the distinction between damage and injury.

2 'A right of way carries with it the right of repairing the way.'
(2) Rights of Common.

Rights of common have always been the most important class of profits, and amongst rights of common stands prominent that which Bracton here describes—common of pasture. Other rights of common are common of turbary, or of cutting turf for fuel to be burnt in a house; common of estovers, or of taking from another's land timber or underwood, heath, furze, fern, etc., to be used for fuel, litter, fodder for cattle, or similar purposes; common of piscary, or the right of fishing in another's water. Of these rights by far the most important is the right of common of pasture.

Though there is much that is obscure in the history of rights of common, indications are not wanting which tend to confirm the view stated in the first chapter of the growth of manors. It was probably in consequence of the change there noticed that the common or uncultivated land of the township was, in process of time, regarded as the sole property of the lord of the manor and was called the lord's waste, and the old customary rights of the villagers came, as notions of strict legal rights of property were more exactly defined, to be regarded as rights of user on the lord's soil—as \textit{jura in re aliena} \textsuperscript{1}. Still the name remained, and attached, and as is seen remarkably in the following passages, to the waste or uncultivated land itself, which was still usually called common land, as if the commoners had rights of property in common over the soil itself, instead of having simply rights \textit{in alieno solo}.

An important consequence too of the old customary law is found in the fact that every freeholder holding lands within the manor had, as of right, common of pasturage on the wastes as incident to his lands. To every new feoffment therefore these rights would attach, and this continued to be the law till the passing of the Statute of Quia Emptores, in the eighteenth year of Edward the First. By that Statute \textsuperscript{1} Compare pp. 6, 7, 18, 19, 25, 44.

CH. III. a mesne lord could no longer make a feoffment of lands to be held of himself in fee; the freeholder therefore whose title rested on a grant subsequent to that Statute was no longer a tenant of the manor, and could claim no rights over the wastes of the manor as incident to his feoffment. The technical name for this class of rights of pasturage incident to freehold lands held of a manor before 18 Edward I is 'common appendant.'

It seems from the following passage that often there were no exact limits as to the number of beasts which a commoner might put upon the waste land. Bracton however indicates that, at all events in the case of a new feoffment, the number must have some relation to the nature and size of the land, and to the prevailing customs. In later times the right of the freeholder holding lands of the lord of the manor came to be expressly defined. He was entitled to have common of pasture for so many beasts useful in agriculture for tilling or manuring the soil, as his arable land would sustain during the winter. This is expressed technically as a right of common of pasture for all commonable cattle levant and couchant upon the lands. This class of rights of common of pasture enjoyed by the freeholders of the manor over the wastes of the manor as necessarily incident to their freeholds is the most ancient and in early times by far the most important class of rights of common.

If the view above given of the history of these rights of common be correct, it will be seen that the rights of the commoners and the rights of the lord must in very early times have come in conflict. Already in the time of Glanvill we find the law recognised and protected by a regular form of

1 It will be borne in mind that wherever at the present day a freeholder holds in fee of the lord of a manor that relation must have been created previous to the eighteenth year of Edward I. See Chapter IV. § 5.

2 See Mr. Joshua Williams’ note on the case of Lord Dunraven v. Llewellyn (12 Queen’s Bench Reports, 791; Elements of Real Property, p. 123, and ib. Appendix C), and see the judgment of Lord Hatherley in Warrick v. Queen’s College, Oxford, Law Rep. 6 Ch. Appeals, p. 726. action the right of the commoner, by enabling him to bring an assize of novel disseisin against any one who disturbed him in the enjoyment of his right of common. Would this form of action protect the commoner against any curtailment of the land over which he exercised his rights by the lord? It seems that the fair inference to be drawn from Bracton's comment on the Statute of Merton (20 Henry III, cap. 4) is that the lord had no right independently of that Statute to appropriate any portion of the waste as against the freeholders having rights of common appendant. The effect of that Statute was to establish the right of the lord to appropriate the land over which rights of common of pasture existed, provided he left sufficient for the tenants of the manor in convenient places, with proper means of access. This is the footing on which the law as to the respective rights of the lord and the freeholders of the manor has rested ever since. The Statute of Merton only applied to the rights of common of pasture enjoyed by freehold tenants of the manor over the wastes of the manor. Rights of common enjoyed by prescription or grant by persons other than the tenants of the manor were beyond its scope; nor did it apply to rights of cutting turf or peat (common of turbary), nor to rights of taking 'estovers,' such as wood, gorse, heath, or fern.

Rights of common, other than those enjoyed by freehold tenants of a manor as such, created by grant or prescription and attached to the ownership of lands, are called rights of 'common appurtenant.' Where, as is usually the case, the claim rests on prescription, it is said in technical language that the tenant in fee of the lands and all those whose estate he has have enjoyed the right from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, or during the period required by the Prescription Act.

1 Glanvill, lib. xiii. cap. 37; above, p. 96.
2 See Coke's Second Institute, 87.
3 This is technically called prescribing in a que estate.
4 2 and 3 Will. IV, c. 71.
A right of common may also be granted to a man and his heirs irrespective of the ownership of any land, and then it descends like an estate in fee simple, and is called a right of common ‘in gross.’

Bracton points out in the following passage that the lord could not curtail the common over which rights of common appurtenant or in gross existed, by any right derived either from the common law or from the Statute of Merton. A provision however of the Statute of Westminster II placed prescriptive rights of common of pasture appurtenant upon the same footing as rights of common appendant. It should be observed that where the right of common can be traced expressly to a grant, which gives the right over a definite extent of waste ground, the lord cannot enclose or curtail the common as against his own express grant.

The above may be taken as an outline of the leading principles of the law relating to rights of common at the present day. Much waste land has however from time to time been enclosed under local Acts of Parliament, and various general provisions have been enacted providing machinery for enclosing commons, with compensation to the owner of the soil and the various persons interested in the land.

Bracton, lib. iv. cap. 38. fol. 222. Quoniam magis celebris est illa servitus per quam conceditur aliqui jus pascendi, ideo primo dicendum est de illa quae dicitur communia pasturae. Communia autem nomen generale est, et convenit suis partibus sicut genus se habet ad suas species. Communia enim ex virtute vocabuli componitur ex una et cum, et subintelligitur alio, (id est) communia in alieno et una cum alio et non in fundo proprio, quia nemini servit suis fundus proprius ut supra. Acquititur enim

1 13 Ed. I. c. 46, given below, Chapter IV. § 4.
2 The rights of copyhold tenants of the manor to common resting on the custom of the manor will be treated of in dealing with copyhold rights generally. See Chapter V. § 6.
4 Thus we see how the doctrines of Roman law coincided with the interest of the lord to reduce the rights of commoners to the character of jura in alieno solo. See above, p. 155.
COMMON OF PASTURE.

communia multis ex causis. Scilicet ex causa donationis, ut si quis dererit terram cum pertinentiis et cum communia pasturae etc.1 Item ex causa emptionis et venditionis, ut si quis communiam emerit in fundo alieno, ut pertineat ad tenementum suum, licet sit de feodo alieno et diversa baronia, et ex constitutione dominorum fundorum. Item acquiritur ex causa dominorum fundorum, sicut per servitium certum2. Item ex causa vicinatis, ut si quis cum vicino, et vicinus cum eo3. Item ex longo usu sine constitutione cum pacifica possessione, continua et non interrupta, ex scientia, negligentia, et patientia dominorum, non dicho balli- vorum, quia pro traditione accipiuntur, ita quod nec per vim nec clam nec precario ut supra. Et eisdem rationibus pertinere poterit communia ad liberum tenementum, in eo autem quod communia est nomen generale continens sub se plures species. Est enim communia in eo, quod dicitur pastura, de omni quod edis poterit vel pasci, large sumpto vocabulo vel strete, large, ut si quis habeat in alieno communium pasturae, scilicet herbagii, pensionae, sive glandis sive nucis, et quicquid sub nomine pensionae continetur. Item foliorum et frondium stritae, scilicet aliquod istorum unum vel duo. Item distinguui poterit communia pasturae per tempora, ut si omni tempore vel certis temporibus et certis horis. Item per loca, ut si ubique, et per totum, sine aliquas exceptiones. Excipiuntur tamen quasdam tacite, et quandoque expresse; sicut rationabilia defensa, et exigui non poterunt ratione pasturae, nisi specialiter concedan tur, et non nisi post tempus, qualia sunt blada, prata, ligna, Byngheys sicut ad boves4, item ad vaccas et vitulos suis temporibus, item ad oves multones et oves matricis, et agnos suis temporibus. Item nec in curia alienus nec in gardenis, nec in viridarinis, nec parcis vel hujusmodi. Item nec in dominicis alienius, quae claudi possunt et excoli, nisi per modum certum constitutionis, et certis temporibus vel certis locis et determinatis et infra certa loca. Item ad certa genera aeveriorum, vel

CH. III.
Sect. II.
§ 18 (2).

—in this case the common of pasture would attach or be appurtenant to the land granted, in other words would be enjoyed by the grantee and his successors in title over land other than that granted.

1 As to common of vicinage, see below, p. 165.

2 Rights of common would prima facie be exercisable over waste land only. Of course they may be granted over any land, but this requires express mention in the grant. So also if there be a special right of common for any species of cattle other than the ordinary commons moman.
si ad omnimoda averia et sine numero, vel cum coarctatione et cum numero, vel ad certum genus averiorum. Item notandum quod non debet dici communia, quod quia habuerit in alieno sive pro precio, sive ex causa emtionis, cum tenementum non habeat ad quod possit communia pertinere, sed potius herbagium dici debet quam communia; cum hoc posset esse quasi personale quid, sive certum dederit quis pro herbagio habendo sive incertum. Item communia dici poterit secundum quod stat in generali, secundum quod supra dictum est, habere jus sodiendi in alieno, aurum scilicet, et inde aurifodina dici potest locus iste. Item argentum et inde argentifodina, et sic de ceteris metallis. Item jus sodiendi lapides, cretam, arenam, et turbam, et hujusmodi. Item communia et non herbagium, ut jus falcandi herbam vel brueram vel hujusmodi ad rationabile estoverium. Item eodem modo ad secundum in alieno bosco ad rationabile estoverium aedificandi, claudendi, et arrendi.

Ib. fol. 224. Nemo poterit communiam pasturae clamare ut pertinentem ad liberum tenementum suum nisi ille qui liberum tenementum habet. Liberum autem dicitur ad differentiam villenagii et villanorum qui tenent villenagium, quia non habent actionem nec assisam, sed dominus cujus liberum tenementum villenagium fuerit.

Ib. fol. 225 b. (Of defences open to the tenant of the land to an assise of novel disseisin for disturbance of common rights.) Item poterit tenens respondere contra assisam quod querens nullam communiam clamare potuit in tali loco, quia tenementum illud est suum separale, et quod illud includere possit et excolere pro voluntate sua, et inclusum habere omni tempore. Ad quod querens (si possit) doceat contrarium vel diversum per assisam, scilicet quod nullo tempore includi poterit, vel quod non nisi certis horis et temporibus. Item respondere potest tenens et

1 This distinction was not recognised in later law. Common of pasture in gross, i.e. not appurate to any tenement, is recognised as a class of rights of common.
2 The right to mines of gold and silver is by the common law of England part of the royal prerogative. Blackstone, i. 394.
3 'Turf,' or peat—the well-known right called common of turbary.
4 As to the foundation of the claim of copyholders to rights of common, see Chapter V. § 6.
5 This is one of the many allusions which this passage contains to rights of common pasturage enjoyed over lands at certain periods of the year, which at other times is the separate property of an individual. See above, p. 6.
COMMON RIGHTS. 161

CH. III.
Sect. II.
§ 18 (1).

dicere quod ille qui queritur nullum omnino habet tenementum liberum, vel quasi, ad quod aliqua communio pertinere possit vel etiam mansuenuelam. Item dicere potest quod nulla communio pertinet ad tale tenementum: quia illud fuit aliquando foresta, boscus, et locus vastae solitudinis et communia, et jam inde efficitur assartum, vel redactum est in culturam, et non debet communio pertinere ad communiam, et ubi omnes de patria solebant communicare 1. Ad hoc facit de Itinere W. de Ralegh in comitatu War. assisa novae disseisinae de communia pasturae si Augustinus, etc. 2 Eodem modo dici poterit de mariscis, et alis vastitatisbus in culturam redactis, quia ubi eadem ratio, ibi esse debet idem jus.

Ib. fol. 227. Item potest constituio servitutis aliquando minui et restringi, ut si prius constituatur quod per totum et ubique, restringi poterit quod certum locum. . . . Item quod prius sine numero, coarctari potest ad certum numerum. . . . Et eodem modo poterunt omnia praedicta augeri et ampliari, sed non contra voluntatem contrahentium; quia per hoc competeret assisa novae disseisinae domino tenenti, sed in contrarium per vim ageretur, sicut competeret assisa novae disseisinae de communia pasturae et cui debetur servitus secundum modum et constitutionem servitutis. Est tamen quaedam constitutio quae dicitur constitutio de Merton, per quam etiam invito eo cui servitus debetur communio coarctatur, unde primo videndum est quibus est illa constitutio, et est talis 3:

Quia multi sunt magnates qui feudaverunt milites et libere tenentes suos in maneriis suis de parvis tenementis, et qui impediti sunt per eodem quod commodum suum facere non possunt de residuo manteriorum suorum, sicut de vastis, boscis, et pasturis magnis, desicet ipsi feudati suficientem habere possent pasturam, scilicet quantum ad tenenta sua pertinet: ideo provisum est et concessum ab omnisbus, quod cum haecmodi feudati a quibuscunque de cetero arramaverint erga dominos suos assisam novae disseisinae de communia pasturae, de hoc quod aliquam partem tenementorum suorum exculerint, si coram justiciariis cognove-

1 The language of this passage and the principle here stated seem strongly to support the historical view that the idea that all the neighbouring inhabitants had equal rights over the soil of waste lands is the true origin of rights of common.

2 This is the name of the case decided on the circuit in question.

3 See the text and translation of this statute as given in the Statutes of the Realm, above, § 9.
rant quod sufficientem habeant pasturam quantum ad tenementum suum pertinet cum libero ingressu et egressu, et chaceam de tenementis suis usque ad pasturam illam vel viam, tunc inde sint contenti, et illi de quibus tales questi sunt quieti sint de hoc quod commodum suum ita fecerint de terris, vastis, et pasturis suis. Si autem dixerint quod sufficientem pasturam non habuerint, quantum pertinet ad tenementa sua, cum sufficienti ingressu et egressu, tunc inde inquiratur veritas per assisam. Et si per assisam recognitum fuerit quod in aliquo impediverint ipsius domini ingressum vel egressum, vel quod habeant sufficientem pasturam, secundum quod praedictum est, tunc recuperent queren tes se sitinam suam per visum recognitorum, ita quod per discretionem et sacramentum orundem habeant conjurerentes sufficientem pasturam cum sufficienti et competenti ingressu et egressu, in forma praedicta, et disseallatores in misericordia, et damna reddant sicut prius redi solent ante provisionem istam. Si autem recognitum fuerit per assisam quod querntes sufficientem habeant pasturam, cum libero ingressu et egressu secundum quod praedictum est, tunc licite faciant domini sui commodum de residuo, et in quo casu, si quis liber homo foecatus fuerit per aliquem, et occasione alius aias captae vel alia occasione, vel si non permiserit dominum suum includere, vel si, cum incluserit, hayas suas frerget et fossata, et muros suas prostraverit verim cui resi est non posset, competit domino breve domini regis in hac forma:—

Rex Vicecomiti salutem. Ostensum est nobis ex parte A quod cum in curia nostra coram nobis et consilio nostro sit provisum et concessum quod magnates Angliae et milites et alii qui libros tenentes suos foecaverint de parvis tenementis in manulis suis commodum suum facere possint de residuo mancorum sicut de vastis, boscis et pasturis, si ipsi foecati sufficientem habeant pasturam quatenus ad tenementa sua pertinet cum libero ingressu et egressu, et iese A parcum suum per multum tempus jam in unus habuit, boscum vel hujusmodi; B qui parvum tenementum habet in eadem villa, vel alia, et de feodo ipsius A, occasione cujusdam assisa novae disseasiae inter eadem et B nuper captae de communia pasturae ipsius B quam pertinere dixit ad liberum tenementum suum in eadem villa, non permittit ipsum A parcum suum habere inclusum, immo hayas suas frangit et fossata, desicat communiam pasturae habere poterit sufficientem

1 The text of the Statute of Merton, given above, p. 115, seems more accurate and intelligible than the reading given in this passage.
THE STATUTE OF MERTON.

extra parcem vel boscum illum, quatenus ad tenementum suum pertainet cum libero ingressu et egressu; et ideo tibi praecipimus quod assumptis tecum liberis et legalibus hominibus de proximo vicineto, per quos rei veritas etc., in propria persona tua accedas apud tales villas et per eorum sacramentum, etc., si praedictus B sufficientem possit habere pasturam extra praedictum parcum vel boscum quatenus pertainet ad liberum tenementum suum in eadem villa cum libero ingressu et egressu vel non. Et si ita esse inveniris tunc eodem A pacem inde habere facias ne amplius, etc.

Teste, etc.

Ad quod imprimit videndum est qualiter constitutio illa sit intelligenda, ne male intellecta trahat utentes ad abusum. Videri oportet utrum ille quem restringit constitutio, sit liber homo proprius vel alienus. Si autem sit alienus non ei imponit legem constitutio, tum quia habet servitutem illam forte sicut ex consensus et conventione ubique, quae dissolvi non potest nec per contrarium voluntatem et dissensum, tum quia non feoffatus est per dominum soli, quod coarctari potest ad certum numerum et determinaturn secundum quantitatem sui tenementi. Et unde in hac casu si dominus soli et proprietas sibi velit aliquid appropriare et includere, hoc facere non poterit sine voluntate et licentia praedictorum, et, si fecerit, per assisam recuperabit. Si autem fuerint libere tenentes proprii tunc refer tali quod fuerint feoffati, quia non omnes nec in omnibus per constitutionem restringantur, et ideo videndum est utrum feoffati fuerint large, silicet per totum et ubique, et in omnibus locis, et ad omnimoda averia et sine numero, et ita tamen quod hujusmodi communia ad ipsos per-

1 That is, whether or not he be a tenant of the manor over the wastes of which the right of common is claimed.

2 The Statute of Merton regulated the respective rights of the lord of the manor and his tenants over the waste. It did not affect the rights of persons who had rights of common appurtenant to freeholds outside the manor. The lord could not by this Statute enclose the waste so as to curtail rights of common appurtenant. By the Statute of Westminster II, 13 Edward I, c. 46 (see Chap. IV. § 4), the provisions of the Statute of Merton were extended to cover the relations of the lord and commoners having rights of common appurtenant.

3 This passage throws light on the much disputed question whether this right of appropriation or appraochment belonged to the lord at common law or rested on the Statutes of Merton and Westminster II. Bracton's authority, particularly valuable as being contemporaneous evidence, is express that the right rested on the Statute, and that except for the Statute the lord could not have 'approved' it at all. See Coke's Second Institute, pp. 354, 474; Grant v. Gunner, 1 Tauntion's Reports, p. 435.
tinet ratione foemamenti, et non propter usum, tales non ligat constitutio memorata, quia foemamentum non tollit, licet tollit absum, et maxime propter consensum eorum voluntarium qui servitutem et communiam concesserunt. Si autem communia fuert stricta cum numero acriorium certo et determinato, licet usus se largius et latius habuerit quam neccesser esset, tales ligat constitutio, quod coarctentur ad certum locum et infra certum locum, dum tamen locus ille sufficiens sit et competens cum libero ingressu et egressu et competenti, quod non sit gravis nec difficilis.
Competens autem debet esse locus, ita quod non longius distet sed propinquius assignetur. Item eodem modo si ita foessatus fuerit quis, sine expressione numeri vel generis, sed ita, cum pastura quantum pertinet ad tantum tenementum in eadem villa, talem ligat constitutio sicut prius cum expressione; quia cum constet de quantitate tenementi, de facili perpendi poterit de numero averiorium et etiam de genere, secundum consuetudinem locorum.
Item si qualitercumque usus fuerit vel foessatus lare vel stricte, si loco competenti usus fuerit, et sive coarctari possit sive non, non tamen coarctari debet cum damno et gravamine ad locum longius distantem, cum distantia inducunt incommoditatem. Et eodem modo coarctari non debet, nisi velit, si accessus sit diffi-cilior... Item tempus spectandum erit, scilicet quod tenementum tempore foemamenti jacuit incultum, et quod tenementum redactum fuit in culturam. Item quod tenementum sit pratum, et quod inclusum est positum in defensum, cum nemo possit com-muniam petere in aliquo tenemento, quod excoli possit, vel in-cludi, vel poni in defensum omni tempore vel saltem aliquo, et ex aliqua generali constitutione, ut si quis dicas, 'do tibi tale tenementum cum communia pasturae quae pertinet ad tantum tenementum in tali villa cum certo numero acriorium, vel sine numero,' hoc intelligendum erit de communia pasturae, quae communis esse debet, et pertinere ad liberum tenementum, hoc est non tenemento quod possit excoli, vel licito sed non omni vel alter dum includitur vel ponitur in defensum tempore, vel si singulis annis possit includi et poni in defensum et excoli, vel alio quod possit

1 This appears to mean that even in the case of freehold tenants of a manor, if rights of common had been expressly granted over the whole waste, &c., the lord could not approve so as to derogate from his express grant.

2 If the dominant tenement was uncultivated or waste land at the time of the feoffment, it seems that rights of common would not attach to it, unless expressly granted.

3 Tenementum here means the servient tenement.
KINDS OF COMMON RIGHTS.

includi, nisi hoc facit specialitas et modus constitutionis servitusis, vel longus usus continuus et pacificus. Modus constitutionis servitusis, ut si dicat quis, 'do tibi tantam terram cum communia pasturae ad tot averia etc. per totam terram meam ubique in terris colendas, pratis, et clavis, et in omnibus locis, et hoc non erit sic intelligendum quod omni tempore, nisi tantum temporibus competentibus, scilicet post blada asportata et faena levata, vel quando tenementum jacet incultum et ad waractum, vel si dicat expresso sic, 'ubiique scilicet quando tenementum jacet incultum etc.' non propter hoc impediri debet dominus quin terram suam excolat quilibet anno si velit, quia non imponit sibí ipsi servitutem per hoc quin possit. Si autem ita dicat, 'cum pastura per totum et in omnibus locis, et secundo anno vel tertio in terra colenda, in terra colenda quando jacet ad waractum,' et adhuc idem erit ubi jacuerit ita ut dicitur, quia bene poterit esse quod nunquam jacebit, nec imponitur ei necessitas quod non colat, quia per hoc non includit se quin possit. Si autem sic dicat, 'omni tempore et in omnibus locis, scilicet quod secundo anno jaceat campus ad waractum vel incultus vel apertus, et quod tali tempore communiam habeat,' tali tempore excoli non possit nec includi, et maxime ubi hoc facit longus usus vel consuetudo a vicinis approbata et do-

1 The import of this passage seems to be that prima facie the right of common extends only over the waste or uncultivated lands properly so called, and not over lands which the tenant has the right to keep enclosed always or for some periods of the year. It was however not unusual for rights of common pasturage to exist over cultivated lands between harvest and seedtime, the lands being for the rest of the year enclosed for the protection of the growing crops. See Nasse, p. 46. This was called in later times common of shack: see Corbet's case, above, p. 6. In the same way there might be rights of common pasturage over meadows after the removal of the hay-crop, until the grass began to grow again. And so where the system prevailed of cultivating the lands in common on the three-field or two-field system, that is, where the individual plots of the various landowners of the community were not divided from each other, but all were cultivated upon a common plan, being divided into two or three fields, one of which was left fallow every year, rights of common pasturage were often recognised over the fallow land. These rights of pasturage were however, as it would appear from this passage, exceptional, and must either be expressly granted, or proved as a local custom. See Nasse, pp. 46–50. These are amongst the rights which, owing to the fiction noticed above (p. 150), that they must originally have been created by grant, it has become impossible to sustain in a court of law unless they are claimed either by copyhold tenants of a manor under a custom, or by freeholders as appurtenant to their tenements. A custom for all the inhabitants of a district to turn out cattle on the waste, stubbles, meadows, or fallows, though doubtless the origin of the quasi-right, would be invalid.
minis, quae pro loge observari debet inter tales. Item vel ubi hoc faciat vicinias, et sine constitutione. Poterit autem esse servitus personalis et realis. Item personalis et realis certis horis et certis temporibus. Item personalis tantum, et sic debetur personis et non tenementis, et quae proprie dici potest herbarium.
Item localis et non certis personis, sicut aliquus universitatis, burgensium et civium, et omnes conqueri possunt et unus nomine universitatis.

1 The whole of this passage is remarkable, as showing the great strength and vitality of common rights at this time.

2 That is, the prescriptive rights of neighbours apart from any relationship of lord and tenant may be of the same character. There is a distinct class of rights of common called common par causae de vicinage. For instance, if there are adjoining wastes A and B belonging to different manors, a commoner who is entitled to put his cattle on common A, may be also entitled to have them permitted to stray into common B. In this case he is said to have common rights par causae de vicinage in common B. This right of common is said to be more properly an excuse for a trespass.

3 This points to the distinction between rights appertaining to land, that is, by the successive owners of a piece of land as and being such owners and passing by alienation of the praedium dominans, and rights in gross, or rights (in rem, of property, available against third persons, opposed to rights in personam) not attached to the ownership of a praedium dominans, or as they were called later, rights in gross.' Compare Dig. lib. viii. tit. i. r:
'servitutes aut personarum sunt, ut usus et usufructus, ut rerum, ut servit-tutes rusticorum praediorum, et urbaniorum.'

4 Both rights of property in the land itself, and rights over the land of another, might be granted (apart from the Statutes of Mortmain) to a corporation. Therefore the rule that inhabitants as such cannot claim a profit in alio solo (see above, p. 150, note 1) does not apply where the rights are claimed in the name of a corporation. A corporation may claim such rights by prescription, because the rights might by legal possibility have originated in a grant. Bracton's language no doubt points to the actual historical origin of these rights, namely, that they were local customs which became legalised.
The theory of the later lawyers excluded from the category of legal rights all profits not capable of originating in a grant.
CHAPTER IV.

LEGISLATION OF EDWARD I.

The reign of Edward I was a period of great legislative activity. The statutes passed in this reign introduced some important changes, which have affected the subsequent history and the present condition of the law. Besides the changes effected by new enactments, the regular action of the courts proceeds, and with it the development and definition of the law. The series of regular reports called the Year Books begins with the reign of Edward II, and contains reports of cases decided to the end of the reign of Edward III, and from the beginning of the reign of Henry IV to the end of that of Henry VIII. 1

The text-books of this reign, of which the principal are the treatises of Britton 2 and Fleta 3 (the Mirror of Justices is

---

1 See Reeves, ii. p. 229. There have been lately published in the series under the direction of the Master of the Rolls, from MSS. in the Libraries of Cambridge University, Lincoln's Inn, the Inner Temple, and the British Museum, six volumes called Year Books, containing reports of cases decided on the itineraries of the judges and at Westminster in the 20th and 21st, 21st and 22nd, 30th and 31st, 32nd and 33rd, 33rd-35th years of Edward I, and 11-13 of Edward III. See Preface to Year Books, 30 and 31 Edward I, p. xxii. The reports of the reign of Richard II are contained in a volume styled Bellew's Reports.

2 There is great doubt as to the authorship of Britton. Some have thought that the name is identical with Bracton, and that the work is merely an authoritative abridgment of Bracton; others have ascribed it to an independent writer. See Nichols' Britton, preface, pp. xviii-xxvii.

3 So named because it was written by some lawyer, perhaps a judge, during imprisonment in the Fleet. (Fleta, preface.)
probably to be ascribed to the reign of Edward II), add but little to the great treatise of Bracton. The treatise called Fleta carries the law down to a point later than the thirteenth year of the king, and contains comments on the changes in the law since Bracton wrote 1.

The changes of historical importance in the law relating to land which were effected by new legislation during this reign will be seen from the following statutes; the development of the common law effected by judicial decisions is reserved for the next chapter.

The statutes of this reign are usually in Latin, though some are in French, and in one case a chapter of a statute is partly in Latin, partly in French 2. It seems impossible to lay down any principle by which the choice of the language was regulated. ‘Both the Latin and French were the languages of the law, and probably were adopted according to the whim of the clerk or other person who drew up the statute 3.’

§ 1. A Manor in the time of Edward I.

The following Statute, though not making any change in the positive law relating to land, is valuable as showing clearly the legal conception of a manor in the time (probably) of Edward I. ‘In my opinion this statute was made sone after the barons’ warre, the whyche ended at the battayle of Evesham, or sone after in the tyme of Kynge Henry the thyrde 4, where as many noblemen of bloud were slayne, and many fled that afterward were attaynted for the treason they did to the Kynge. And by reason thereof their castelles and manours were seased into the Kynge’s handes. And so for

1 The other treatises which were published in this reign were An Abbreviation of Bracton by Gilbert de Thornton, the Summa Magna and Parva of Radulph de Hengham, and a small tract called Pet Asavoir.
2 Statute West. II. ch. 24.
3 Reeves, ii. p. 228.
4 From internal evidence the document would appear to be later than 13 Edward I. See p. 170, note 2.
want of reparations the castelles and the manors fell to ruine and in decaye. And when the Kynge and his counsayle saw that, they thought it was better to extende them and make the most profit that they coude of them, than to lette them fall to the grounde, and come to no manne's helpe and profyte.
Wherefore Kynge Edwarde the first ordeyned this statute to be made the fourth year of his reigne, wherein is contayned many and dyvers chapters and articles, the which at that tyme was but instructions, how and what they shuld do that were commissioners or surveyours in the same.'—(Fitzherbert's Surveyinge, chap. i: a.d. 1539.)

EXTENTA MANERII. 1 Edward II, Stat. 1

Inquirendum est de castris, et alii edificiis fossatis circumdatis, quartum muri, edificia lignea et lapidea, plumbo vel alio modo cooperta, valeant, et pro quanto poterunt appreciari, secundum verum valorem eorumdem murorum et edificiorum: et pro quanto edificia extra fossatum poterunt appreciari, et quantum valeant, una cum garinis, columbariis, et omnibus aliis exitibus curiae per annum.

Item inquirendum est quot campi sunt in dominico, et quot acrae terrae sunt in campo, et quantum valet quaelibet aera per se per annum; item inquirendum est quot acrae prati sunt in dominico, et quantum valet quaelibet aera ad locandum per se per annum, et ad cujusmodi bestias et animalia pastura illa fuerit magis necessaria, et quot et quales possit sustinere, et quantum valet pastura cujuslibet bestiae et animalis per se per annum ad locandum.

Item inquirendum est de pastura forinseca, quae est communis, et quot et quas bestias et quot animalia et quae dominus [rex'] habere possit in eadem, et quantum valeat pastura cujuslibet bestiae et animalis per se per annum ad locandum.

1 This is the date given in most editions of the Statutes. In 'Statutes of the Realm' (i. p. 242) it is included amongst the Statutes of uncertain data, and printed after the Statutes of Edward II.

2 See above, pp. 24, 49.
3 See above, Chap. III. § 18 (d).
4 Some MSS. omit this word, which is not inserted in 'Statutes at Large.'
If it is rightly inserted, the passage would be in accordance with the view taken of the history of the rights of the king, above, p. 19.
CH. IV. Item inquirendum est de parcis et dominicis boscis quae dominus ad voluntatem suam poterit assartare et excolare, et quot acras in se continant, et pro quanto vestura cujuslibet acrae poterit appreciari, et quantum fundus in se contineat et valeat quando prostratus fuerit, et quantum valet quaelibet acra per se per annum.

Item inquirendum est de boscis forinsecis, ubi ali commumicant, quid de eisdem boscis dominus sibi possit appruare, et de quot acris, et pro quanto vestura cujuslibet acrae communiter possit appreciari, et quantum fundus valeat quando prostratus fuerit. Item inquirendum est utrum dominus de residuo boscorum praeceptorum forinsecorum dare possit, et quantum valeant hujusmodi donationes et vendiciones per annum.

Item inquirendum est de pannaggio, herbagio, melle, oleribus, et omnibus aliis exitibus vivariorum, mariscorum, morarum, bruerarum, turbariarum, et vistorum, et quantum valeant per annum.

Item de molandinis, et piscariis separalibus et communibus, quantum valeant per annum.

Item de libere tenantibus quibuscumque et forinsecis vel extrinsecis, inquirendum est quot sunt libere tenentes, et qui, et quas terras, et quae teneminta, et quae feoda teneant, et per quod servitium, utrum per socagium, vel servitium militare, vel alio modo, et quantum valeant per annum et reddant per annum de redditu assissa, et qui tenent per cartam, et qui non,

1 This probably refers to the parks and other enclosures which had been made under the provisions of the Statute of Merton. See Chap. III. §§ 10, 12 (2).

2 That is, what further enclosures can be made without infringing rights of common enjoyed by freeholders who are not tenants of the manor. This would seem to show that this document must be subsequent to the Statute 13 Edward I. c. 46. See below, § 4. For the meaning and derivation of appruare see Glossary.

3 See above, p. 48.

4 ‘Forinseci tenentes’ are probably those tenants who hold of the lord of the manor as a fact, but whose tenementis are not within the ambit of the manor, and who are therefore not tenants of the manor.

5 ‘Rents of assise are the certain rents of freeholders and ancient copyholders, because they be assized and certain, and doth distinguish the same from reddites mobiles, farm-rents for life, years, or at will, which are variable and uncertain.’ Coke, Second Institute, 19.

6 It is an important fact that at this time there were freeholders whose title did not rest on any grant. These were probably the representatives of the free proprietors of the times before the Conquest, who had not only preserved their free status, but also had not become subject to other than a free tenure. See above, Chap. III. § 13.
et qui tenent per antiquam tenuram, et qui per novum feoffamentum. Item inquirendum est de praedictis libere tenentibus et qui sequuntur curiam de comitatu in comitatum, et qui non, et quid et quantum accidit domino post mortem talium libere tenentium.

Item inquirendum est de custumariis, quot sunt custumarii, et quantum terrae quilibet custumarius teneat, et quae opera et quas consuetudines faciant, et quantum valeant opera et consuetudines ejuslibet custumarii per se per annum, et quantum reddant de redditu assisae per annum praeter opera et consuetudines, et qui possint talliari ad voluntatem domini, et qui non.

Item inquirendum est de coterellis, quae cottages et curtulagia teneant, per quod servitium, et quantum reddant per annum pro praedictis cottagis et curtulagis.

Item inquirendum est de placitis et perquisitis comitatum, et curiarum forestarum, cum expeditione canum, et quantum valeant per annum in omnibus exitibus.

Item inquirendum est de ecclesiis quae pertinent ad donationem domini quot et quae sunt, et ubi, et quantum quaelibet ecclesias valet per annum per se, secundum veram estimationem illius.

Item inquirendum est quantum valeant heriota, mundiae, mercheta, consuetudines et servitiae, operationes et consuetudines fornscae, et quantum valeant placita et perquisita, fines et relevia, et omnia alia casualia quae accidere possunt in omnibus per annum.

Translation.

First, it is to be inquired of the castles and also of other buildings compassed about with ditches, what the walls, and buildings of timber and stone, covered with lead, or otherwise,

1 See above, p. 50; Chap. III. § 13; and below, Chap. V. § 6.
2 See above, p. 50.
3 'Advowsons are either advowsons appendant or advowsons in gross. Lords of manors being originally the only founders, and of course the only patrons, of churches, the right of patronage or presentation, so long as it continues annexed to the possession of the manor, as some have done from the foundation of the church to this day, is called an advowson appendant: and it will pass or be conveyed, together with the manor, as incident and appendant thereto, by a grant of the manor only, without adding any other words. But where the property of the advowson has been once separated from the property of the manor by legal conveyance, it is called an advowson in gross, or at large, and never can be appendant any more; but is for the future annexed to the person of its owner, and not to his manor or lands.' Blackstone, ii. 22.
are worth, and how they may be prized according to the very value of the same walls and buildings, and for how much the buildings without the ditch may be prized, and what they be worth with the gardens, [curtilages], dove houses, and all other issues of the court-yard by the year.

It is to be inquired also how many fields are of the demesnes, and how many acres of land are in every field, and what every acre is worth by the year; also it is to be inquired how many acres of meadow are of the demesnes, and how many be in a field, and how much every acre by itself is worth by the year to be let, also how many acres of pasture there be, and for what beasts or cattle the same pasture is most necessary, and how many it will find, and of what manner, and what the pasture of every beast is worth to be let by the year.

Also it is to be inquired of foreign pasture that is common, how many and what beasts and cattle the lord ¹ may have in the same, and how much the pasture of every beast is worth by the year to be let.

Also it is to be inquired of parks and demesne woods which the lord may assert ² and improve at his pleasure, and how many acres they contain, and how much the vesture of an acre is worth; and how much the land is worth after the wood is felled, and how many acres it containeth, and how much every acre is by the year.

Also it is to be inquired of foreign woods, where other men have common, and how much the lord may improve to himself of the same woods, and how many acres, and for how much the vesture of every acre may be valued at, and how much the ground is worth year by after that the wood is felled. And it is to be inquired whether the lord may give or sell anything of the residue of theforesaid woods, and what such gifts and sales are worth by the year.

Also it is to be inquired of pannage ³, herbage ⁴ [of the town], honey, and all other profits of vivaries ⁵, moors, marshes, heaths, turbaries, and waste, and how much they are worth by the year.

Also of mills and fishings several and common, what they be worth by the year.

Also it is to be inquired of freeholders, the which dwell without as well as within, that is to say, how many freeholders there be,

---

¹ Or the king, see note 4, p. 169.
² Or clear.
³ Or pannage = the right to feed pigs or other beasts in woods on beech-mast, acorns, etc.
⁴ See above, p. 152.
⁵ Vivaria = warrens.
and who they are, and what manner lands and tenements, and what fees they hold, and by what services, whether it be by socage or knight service, or otherwise, and what they are worth, and pay yearly of rent of assise, and who hold by charter, and who not, and who by old tenure, and who by new feoffment. Also it is to be inquired of the said free tenants, which do follow the court from county to county and which not, and what and how much falleth to the lord after the death of such free tenants.

It is to be inquired also of customary tenants, that is to wit, how many there be, and how much land every of them holdeth, what works and customs he doth, and what the works and customs of every tenant be worth yearly, and how much rent of assise he paid yearly, besides the works and customs, and which of them may be taxed at the will of the lord, and which not.

It is also to be inquired of cottagers, that is to say, what cottages and curtilages they hold, and by what service, and how much they do pay by the year for all their cottages and curtilages.

It is also to be inquired of pleas and perquisites of the counties and of the courts of the forest, with lawing of dogs,1 and how much they be worth by the year in all issues.

It is also to be inquired of churches that belong to the lord's gift, how many there be, and what, and where, and how much every church is worth by the year after the true estimation of the same.

It is also to be inquired what be the value of heriots, fairs, markets, customs, services, and foreign works and customs; and what the pleas and perquisites [of courts], fines, and reliefs, and all other casualties are worth by the year, that may fall in any of these things.

§ 2. Alienation in Mortmain.

It appears from the following Statute that the provision in Magna Carta2 given in the last chapter was construed as an absolute prohibition against granting lands to religious houses. The prohibition is now extended so as to prevent any alienation of lands 'per quod ad manum mortuam deveniant.' Lands

---

1 So in the margin of 'Statutes at Large,' which seems correct.
2 i.e. mutilating the foot so as to prevent the dog chasing game. Spelman, s. v. Expeditatio.
3 Cap. 43. ed. 1217; above, Chap. III. § 9.
were said to come into a ‘dead hand’ when they were held not by an individual tenant, but by a corporation or body. This expression was probably first applied to the holding of lands by religious bodies or persons who, being ‘professed,’ were reckoned dead persons in law. It then came to be applied to the holding of lands by corporations as opposed to individuals, whether the corporation were ecclesiastical or lay, sole or aggregate.

An attempt was made soon after the passing of this Statute to evade its provisions by bringing collusive actions for the recovery of land, in which the ‘religious men and other ecclesiastical persons’ sued the tenant, who thereafter by arrangement made default. This was held not to be within the Statute of 7 Edward I, the words of that enactment applying only to the case of acquisition of lands by gift or other alienation, and not to recovery by process of law. To stop this practice it was enacted by the Statute of Westminster II that in such a case a jury should determine whether the claimant had right over the land demanded or not. If not, the land claimed was to be forfeited to the lord of the fee, and the same penalty was attached to the attempt of a tenant to protect himself against his lord by setting up crosses in his land and so pretending to avail himself of the privileges of the Templars and Hospitallers. The restriction

1 A corporation is a fictitious person invested by the law with the attribute of perpetuity. This fictitious person may be (1) a corporation aggregate, that is, may consist of many individual persons united together by the law, the aggregate thus formed continuing for ever by a perpetual succession of individual members: such as the mayor and commonalty of a city, the head and fellows of a college, the dean and chapter of a cathedral church. Such a body can only act in its corporate capacity by the use of the ‘common seal.’ The two characteristics of a corporation aggregate are that it possesses perpetual succession and a common seal. (2) A corporation sole is where a person and his successors in infinitum fill a definite office or station which confers a special status or collection of rights and duties, such as the king, a bishop, or the parson of a parish. See Blackstone, i. p. 469.

2 Technically called suffering a ‘recovery.’

3 13 Edward I, c. 33. See Coke’s Second Institute, p. 432.
as to holding lands in mortmain might at all times have been dispensed with by licence from the Crown and the mesne lords if any. In later times, when the power of the Crown to dispense with the provisions of statutes had become an important constitutional question, the right of the Crown to grant licences to alien or take lands in mortmain was made to rest on the Statute 7 and 8 Will. III, c. 37; and by the same Statute all necessity for the consent of the mesne lords was removed. Several exceptions have been introduced in favour of particular corporations or classes of corporations by Act of Parliament, as for instance the Universities and Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, limited companies, and many others. When however no licence has been obtained from the Crown or been conferred by Act of Parliament, the old rule of law still prevails.

Rex Justitiarii suis de Banco, salutem. Cum dudum provisum fuisse quod viri religiosi feoda aliquorum non ingrediuntur sine licentia et voluntate capitalium dominorum de quibus feoda illa immediate tenentur; et viri religiosi postmodum nihilominus tam feoda sua propria quam aliorum haecensus ingressi sint, ea sibi approbiando et emendo, et aliquando ex dono aliorum recipiendo, per quod servitia, quae ex hujusmodi feodis debentur, et quae ad defensem regni ab initio provisa fuerunt, indebita subtrahuntur, et domini capitales escaetas suas inde amittunt; nos super hoc pro utilitate regni congruum remedium provideri volentes, de consilio praetororum, comitum et aliorum fidicium regni nostri de consilio nostro existentium, providimus, statuimus, et ordinavimus, quod nullus religiosus aut alius quicunque terras aut tenementa aliqua emere vel vendere, aut sub colore donationis aut termini vel alterius tituli cùjuscumque, ab aliquo recipere, aut alio quovis modo, arte vel ingenio, sibi appropriae praesumat, sub forisfactura corundem, per quod ad manum mortuam terrae et tenementa hujusmodi deveniant quoque modo. Providimus etiam

1 This Statute is in the form of a writ or ordinance addressed to the Justices of the Common Pleas.

2 By Magna Carta, c. 43; above, p. 114.
quod si quis religiosus aut alius, contra præsens statutum, aliquo modo, arte vel ingeni, venire praesumperit, liceat nobis, et alii immediatis capitalibus dominis feodi taliter alienati, illud infra annum a tempore alienationis hujusmodi ingredi et tenere in feodo et haereditate. Et si capitalis dominus immediatus negligens fuerit, et feodum hujusmodi ingredi noluerit infra annum, tunc liceat proximo capitali domino mediato feodi illius, infra dimidium annum sequentem, feodum illud ingredi et tenere, sicut praedictum est; et sic quilibet dominus mediatus faciat, si propinquior dominus in ingrediendo hujusmodi feodum negligens fuerit, ut praedictum est. Et si omnes hujusmodi capitales domini hujusmodi feodi, qui pleae fuerint actatis, et infra quatuor maris, et extra prisonam, per annum annum negligentes vel remissi fuerint in hac parte, nos statim post annum completum a tempore quo hujusmodi emptiones, donationes, aut alias appropriationes fieri congerit, terras et tenementa hujusmodi capiendum in manum nostram, et alios inde feoffabimus per certa servitiae nobis inde ad defensionem regni nostri facienda; salvis capitalibus dominis feodorum illorum wardis, escoetis, et alii ad ipsos pertinentibus, ac servitiis inde debitis et comsetis.

Et ideo vobis mandamus quod statutum praedictum coram vobis, legi et de cetero firmiter teneri et observari faciatis. T. R. apud Westmonasterium xv° die Novembris anno etc. septimo.

Translation.

The king to his Justices of the Bench greeting. Where of late it was provided that religious men should not enter into the fees of any without licence and will of the chief lord of whom such fees be holden immediately, and notwithstanding such religious men have entered as well into their own fees as into the fees of other men, appropriating and buying them, and sometimes receiving them of the gift of others, whereby the services that are due of such fees and which at the beginning were provided for defence of the realm, are wrongfully withdrawn, and the chief lords do lease their escheats of the same, We therefore to the profit of our realm intending to provide convenient remedy, by the advice of our prelates, earls, barons, and other our subjects, being of our council, have provided, made, and ordained, that no person religious or other, whatsoever he be, that will buy or sell any lands or tenements, or under the colour of gift or lease, or that will receive by reason of any other title, whatsoever it be, lands or tenements, or by any other craft or engine will presume to appropriate to himself under pain of forfeiture of the same, whereupon such lands or tenements may anywise come into mortmain. We have provided also that if any person, religious or other, do presume either by craft or engine to offend against this statute, it shall be lawful to us and other chief lords of the fee immediate to enter into the land so aliened within a year from the time of the alienation, and to hold it in fee as an inheritance. And if the chief lord immediate be negligent, and will not enter into such fee within the year, then it shall be lawful to the next chief lord immediate of the same fee to enter into the same land within half a year next following, and to hold it as before is said; and so every lord immediate may enter into such land if the next lord be negligent in entering into the same fee as is aforesaid. And if all the chief lords of such fee, being of full age, within the four seas, and out of prison, be negligent or slack in this behalf for the space of one whole year, we, immediately after the year accomplished from the time that such purchases, gifts, or appropriations had to be made, shall take such lands and tenements into our hand, and shall infeoff other therein by certain services to be done to us for the defence of our realm, saving to the chief lords of the same fees, their wards and escheats, and other things to them belonging, and the services for the same due and accustomed. And therefore we command you that ye cause the aforesaid statute to be read before you, and from henceforth to be kept firmly and observed. Witness Myself at Westminster the 15th day of November, the seventh year of our reign.

Statute of Westminster II, 13 Edward I, c. 32.

Cum viri religiosi et aliae personae ecclesiastice implacinent aliquem, et implacitus facerit defaltam, ob quam tenementum amittere debeat, quia Justitiarii hucusque tenuerunt quod, si implacitus facerit defaltam per collusionem, ut cum petens occasione Statuti per titulum doni aut alterius alienationis seisinam de tenemento consequi non posset, per illam defaltam consequeretur, et fieret fraus Statuto; ordinatum est per Dominum Regem et concessum quod in hoc casu, postquam defalta facta fuerit, inquiratur per patriam utrum petens habeat jus in sua petitione aut non. Et si compertum fuerit quod petens habet in sua petitione, procedatur ad judicium pro petenti, et recuperet seisinam suam. Et si jus non habuerit incurratur tenementum proximo domino feodi, si illud petat infra annum a tempore

1 7 Edward I, c. 13; above, p. 175.
2 i.e. by a jury; see p. 129.
LEGISLATION OF EDWARD I.

CH. IV. § 2. inquisitionis captae. (The remaining provisions of the chapter are similar to those of the Statute 7 Edward I.)

Translation.

When religious men and other ecclesiastical persons do implead any, and the party impleaded maketh default, whereby he ought to lease the lands, forasmuch as the justices have thought hitherto that if the party impleaded make default by collusion, that where the demandant by occasion of the statute could not obtain seisin of the land by title of gift or other alienation he shall now by reason of the default, and so the statute is defrauded; it is ordained by our lord the king and granted, that in this case after the default made it shall be inquired by the country whether the demandant had right in the thing demanded, or no. And if it be found that the demandant had right in his demand, the judgment shall pass with him and he shall recover seisin; and if he hath no right the land shall accrue to the next lord of the fee, if he demand it within a year from the time of the inquest, etc.

§ 3. Estates Tail.

With the reign of Edward I we arrive at the period when the influence of the lords of manors (domini capitales) upon legislation was most strongly felt. The Statute of Westminster II consists of fifty chapters dealing with various branches of the law; the first of them is known as the Statute De Donis Conditionalibus. The object of this enactment was, as stated in its text, to protect inheritances, and to lessen the danger of the lord's right of escheat being defeated or indefinitely postponed by the alienation of the tenant.

The technical expression 'conditional gift' has been already explained in commenting on the passage of Bracton given above¹. It has been already seen that in Bracton's time a gift accompanied by words of procreation, as, for instance, to a man and the heirs of his body, or to a man and his wife and the heirs of their bodies, and similar expressions, was held to be an estate of inheritance conditional on issue being born; until this event happened the interest was in effect merely an estate for life. It was, strictly speaking, an estate descendible to the class of heirs mentioned in the gift, if such there should be. If therefore a donee, holding to himself and the heirs of his body, made an alienation of his land, his heirs, Bracton tells us, would be bound to warranty, that is, to uphold the gift, inasmuch as they could only claim by descent from their ancestor and take nothing by the original gift. These estates therefore, upon the happening of the condition, differed from ordinary estates in fee simple only in the restricted character of their devolution to the class of heirs named in the gift. So soon as the condition was performed by the birth of issue, the tenant could alienate and convey an estate in fee simple. So if the donee of such an estate committed treason, the fee simple would, after birth of issue, be forfeited. This would not have been the case if the descent had been secured by virtue of the form of the gift. The power of alienating the whole would as a matter of course involve the power of alienating particular rights over the land, such as granting a rent payable out of it, or charging it with debts so as to bind successors in title. If however the land was not alienated, it would descend not according to the ordinary rules affecting inheritances, but according to the mode expressed in the gift. It can hardly be doubted that this strained construction was put upon such gifts in order to favour the practice of alienation, which was dear to the common lawyers and to the great mass of landowners, though abhorrent to the domini capitaes.

¹ See Chapter III. § 15.

It was to restrain the practice of alienating these conditional estates, and so at once to prevent the lord losing the benefit of escheat upon failure of the descendants of his feoffee, and to protect the interests of the heir, that the Statute de Donis Conditionalibus was passed. In order to effect this object it was provided that such an alienation should not defeat the devolution of the estate to the heir, but that in the event of the tenant of a conditional estate alienating, the heir on the decease of his ancestor might recover the estate from the feoffee, or any person claiming under him. It was further provided that where the tenant had made a feoffment in fee, having had issue born, who had subsequently died, the original donor (or lord) might recover the land from the feoffee by the same form of remedy as he might have employed before the Statute to recover land which his tenant had conveyed away for an estate in fee without having had issue born.

The effect of this Statute was to create a new species of estates of inheritance, which, except under certain special circumstances, could not be alienated so as to defeat the expectant interest of the issue specified in the gift, or postpone the reversion of the lord. There was it is true no direct provision restraining the grant in fee simple of such estates. No forfeiture or other immediate penalty would be incurred either by feoffor or feoffee. But inasmuch as the feoffor could only give a title valid against himself and not as against his issue or his lord after his own decease, the fee simple which he would convey to the feoffee would be insecure and precarious, and liable to be defeated by the issue of the feoffor, or after failure of the issue, by the lord or original donor. An estate in fee which was thus liable to be defeated was called in later times a base fee\(^1\).

The provision of the Statute that the will of the donor as expressed in the charter should for the future be observed was held by the tribunals to have the following interpretation:— Wherever lands were granted by words which before the Statute would have created a conditional gift of one of the kinds specified in the Statute, such a gift would now pass an estate of less extent than a fee simple. Thus, suppose \(A\), tenant in fee simple, made a grant to \(B\) and the heirs male of his body. This limitation, which before the Statute would have been a fee simple conditional on \(B\) having a son born, was now held to convey a special kind of estate of inheritance, namely an estate descendible only to heirs male. This was

---

1 This expression is usually applied at the present day to the estate created by the alienation of tenant in tail not in possession without consent of the "Protector" (see below, p. 210), in which case he bars his own issue, but not remaindermen or reversioners. See 3 & 4 Will IV. c. 74, § 35.
considered to be a smaller estate than a fee simple which was capable of descending to heirs general, i.e. collateral as well as lineal. This secondary species of fee has ever since this Statute been designated *an estate tail, feudum tailiatum*¹, being a portion of an estate taillée—cut off—from the fee. Hence it came to be established that when A, tenant in fee simple, had made the grant above mentioned he had not granted away all that he had to grant, some interest or estate was left in him still, the fee simple in fact was not gone; but inasmuch as the right of present enjoyment had been parted with for an estate which would last as long as B and his male line continued, the fee simple was what was called an estate in reversion, as opposed to one in possession. B's estate was called an estate in fee tail, an estate cut off from the larger estate; and in technical language the effect of the above grant would be, that B would have an estate in fee tail in possession, A would have an estate in fee simple in reversion expectant upon the determination of the estate tail². The difference between an estate in reversion and a mere possibility should be noticed. After the Statute, and the judicial interpretation of it above explained, A would have an estate or definite interest known to the law, which he could if he pleased convey by the proper mode and vest in another person. Before the Statute he would merely have had the possibility or chance of the fee simple escheating to him on failure of B's male issue; and this is not a present disposable right known to the law, but is merely a possibility of obtaining such a right³. In consequence of the recognition of this new estate or interest in lands—the estate tail—it became possible to create interests in lands of a much more complicated character than before. When a person had granted away the fee simple he had disposed of all that he had to grant, and could make no further valid disposition of his property. But now that an interest was recognised intermediate between the estate for life and the estate in fee simple, it became possible to grant lands as follows—to A for life, and after the expiration of that interest (or, more shortly, remainder) to B and the heirs of his body, remainder to C and his heirs. Here the ultimate gift to C, though passing to him at once an estate, would be merely an estate in expectancy, that is the enjoyment of it would be postponed, not only till A’s death, but also till after the failure of B’s lineal descendants. We shall see how the great restriction imposed on alienation by this Statute was broken in upon by the action of the tribunals. The further history of estates tail is reserved for the next chapter.

¹ The expression is used in the Statute of Westminster II itself, 13 Edward I, c. 46.
² This conclusion seems not to have been reached at once. In a note to a case in 31 Edward I (Year Book, p. 384) it is said that 'in a gift in frank-marriage the reversion is always saved and supposed, but in a gift in tail the reversion is not saved if the reversion be not expressly saved in the charter.' No doubt it was usual in charters to express that the land on failure of the issue of the donee should revert to the donor and his heirs.
³ An escheat is however sometimes improperly called a reversion.

De Donis Conditionalibus.

In primis, de tenementis quae multotiens dantur sub conditione, videlicet, cum aliquis dat terram suam aliqui viro et ejus uxori et haeredibus de ipsis viro et muliere procreatis, adjecit condi-

1 See Chap. V. § 2.

2 ‘This is the only word which the said Statute of W. 2, that created estate tail, useth; and it includeth, not only all corporate inheritances which are or may be held, but also all inheritances issuing out of any of those inheritances, or concerning or annexed to or exercisable within the same, though they lie not in tenure, therefore all these without question may be entailed. As rents, estovers, commons or other profits whatsoever granted out of land, or uses, offices, dignities which concern lands or certain places may be entailed within the said statute because these savour of the realty. But if the grant be of an inheritance merely personal, or to be exercised about chattels, and is not issuing out of land, nor concerning any land or some certain place, such inheritances cannot be entailed, because they savour nothing of the realty.’ Coke upon Littleton, 19 h. See Instances, ibid.

3 To bring the gift within the Statute to the words of inheritance must be added words ‘of procreation.’ It must be expressed that the heirs are to be the actual issue of the donee or donees. The Conveyancing Act 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 5) makes the words ‘in tail’ sufficient without the words ‘heirs of the body.’
tione expressa tali, quod si hujusmodi vir et mulier sine haerede de ipsiis viro et muliere procreato obissent, terra sic data ad donatorem vel ad ejus haeredem revertatur; in casu etiam cum quis dat tenementum aliqui in liberum maritagiunm quod donum habet conditionem annexam, licet non exprimatur in carta doni, quae talis est, quod si vir et mulier sine haerede de ipsiis viro et muliere procreato obierint, tenementum sic datum ad donatorem vel ad ejus haeredem revertatur; in casu etiam cum quis dat tenementum aliqui et haeredibus de corpore suo exeuntibus; durum videbatur, et adhuc videtur hujusmodi donatoribus et haeredibus donatorum quod voluntas ipsorum in donis suis expressa non fuerit priscus nec adhuc est observata. In omnibus enim prae dictis casibus post prolem suscitatum et exeuntem ab ipsis quibus tenementum sic fuit datum conditionaliter, lucusque habuerunt hujusmodi feoffati potestatem alienandi tenementum sic datum, et exhaerediti de tenemento exitum ipsorum, contra voluntatem donatorum et formam de dono expressam: et praeterea cum deficiente exitu de hujusmodi feoffatis, tenementum sic datum ad donatorem vel ad ejus haeredem reverti debuit per formam in carta de dono expressam, licet exitus, si quis fuerit, obisset, per factum et feoffamentum ipsorum, quibus tenementum sic fuit datum sub conditione, exclusi fuerunt lucusque de versione corundem tenementorum, quod manifesto fuit contra formam doni sui: propter quod Dominus Rex, perpendens quod necessarium et utile est in prae dictis casibus apponere remedium, statuit, quod voluntas donatoris secundum formam in carta doni sui manifeste expressam de caetero observetur, ita quod non habeant illi, quibus tenementum sic fuit datum sub conditione, potestatem alienandi

1 The Statute was soon extended by judicial interpretation so as to cover gifts when the words of donation were only spoken as well as when they were embodied in a charter. 'Note, that if one demand land by formesdon (see below, p. 184, n. 2) either in the "reverter" or in the "descender," it is not necessary that he have any evidence of the form, except matter in pais' (facts on which the jury may rest their verdict), 'for although he have not any charter, he shall be received to aver by good matter in pais that the thing was thus given.' Year Book, 20 Edward I, p. 130.

2 The Courts seem to have held in the beginning of the reign of Edward II that the word 'heirs' was left out of the Statute by mistake of the clerk, and that the Statute was binding not only on the donee but on his heirs in infinitum. See Reeves, ii. 200. Thus lands granted after the passage of this Statute to a man and the heirs of his body could never, except as explained in the next chapter, be alienated so as to defeat the interest of the heir by descent, or the reversion of the donor. This however was the only restriction upon alienation; and therefore an alienation in fee simple by tenant in tail conveyed the estate to the donee, subject to the rights of the reversioner or remainder-man upon failure of the issue in tail, and to that of the issue, to avoid the gift by bringing the action called formediton in the 'reverter,' 'remainder,' or 'descender.' A gift of the fee by tenant in tail without barring the entail conveys what is called 'a base fee.' See Stephen, vol. i. p. 238 (8th ed.).

1 As to tenancy per legem Angliae, or by the curtesy, see above, Chap. III. § 16.

2 This was called the writ of 'formediton (forma dosi) in the descender,' and was the appropriate remedy when the heir of tenant in tail, upon whom the estate tail had descended, sought to recover against the alienee of a preceding tenant in tail. It was in the nature of a writ of right, differing from it in being applicable to the recovery of an estate tail, the writ of right being for the recovery of the fee.

3 This writ was called the writ of formediton in the reverter. No mention is made of the writ of formediton in the remainder, by which the remainderman could recover; e.g. where lands were granted to A in tail remainder to B in fee, A aliens for an estate in fee simple to C and dies without issue. B recovers against C by the form of the original gift creating the estate tail. According to Reeves (ii. p. 201) this writ first appears early in the reign of Edward II. A specimen however of a writ of formediton in the remainder, the
DE DONIS CONDITIONALIBUS.

Et scientum, quod hoc statutum quoad alienationem tenementi contra formam doni imponerum faciendum locum habet, et ad dona prius facta non extenditur. Et si finis super hujusmodi tenemento imponerum levetur, ipso jure sit nullus, nec habeant haeredes hujusmodi, aut illi ad quos spectat reversio, licet plenae sint metatis, in Anglia, et extra prizonam, necesse apponere clameum suum.

Translation.

First, concerning lands that many times are given upon condition, that is, to wit, where any giveth his land to any man and his wife, and to the heirs begotten of the bodies of the same man and his wife, with such condition expressed that if the same man and his wife die without heir of their bodies between them begotten, the land so given shall revert to the giver or his heir; in case also where one giveth lands in free marriage, which gift hath a condition annexed, though it be not expressed in the deed of gift, which is this, that if the husband and wife die without heir of their bodies begotten, the land so given shall revert to the giver or his heir; in case also where one giveth land to another and the heirs of his body issuing, it seemed very hard and yet seemeth to the givers and their heirs, that their will being expressed in the gift was not heretofore nor yet is observed. In all the cases aforesaid after issue begotten and born between them, to whom the lands were given under such condition, heretofore such feoffees had power to alienate the land so given, and to disinherit their issue of the land, contrary to the minds of the givers, and contrary to the form expressed in the gift: and further, when the issue of such feoffee is failing, the land so given ought to return to the giver or his heir by form of gift expressed in the deed, though the issue, if any remainder being expectant upon a joint estate for lives (not upon an estate tail), is to be found in the Year Book, 30 Edward I, p. 180.

1 The Chancery was the ‘officina brevium,’ the office from which the writs were issued under the Great Seal. The duties of the Chancellor and his clerks in this respect were simply ministerial, they had no power to give validity to a new form of writ, except so far as that power was conferred upon them by the Statute of Westminster II, c. 24. See below, Chap. VI, and Blackstone, iii. p. 49.

2 The effect of a fine in barring estates tail, that is, enabling the tenant in tail to alienate for an estate in fee simple, was not permitted till the Statute 32 Hen. VIII, c. 36 (Blackstone, ii. 353); and as to the history of the law relating to the necessity of putting in a claim to avoid an interest being barred by a fine, ibid. p. 254.
CH. IV. § 3. were, had died; yet by the deed and feoffment of them, to whom land was so given upon condition, the donors have heretofore been barred of their reversion of the same tenements which was directly repugnant to the form of the gift: wherefore our lord the king, perceiving how necessary and expedient it should be to provide remedy in the aforesaid cases, hath ordained, that the will of the giver according to the form in the deed of gift manifestly expressed shall be from henceforth observed, so that they to whom the land was given under such condition shall have no power to alien the land so given, but that it shall remain unto the issue of them to whom it was given after their death, or shall revert unto the giver or his heirs if issue fail, either by reason that there is no issue at all, or if any issue be, it fall by death, the heir of such issue failing. Neither shall the second husband of any such woman from henceforth have anything in the land so given upon condition after the death of his wife, by the law of England, nor the issue of the second husband and wife shall succeed in the inheritance, but immediately after the death of the husband and wife, to whom the land was so given, it shall come to their issue or return unto the giver or his heir as before is said. And forasmuch as in a new case new remedy must be provided, this manner of writ shall be granted to the party that will purchase it. . . . The writ whereby the giver shall recover when issue faileth is common enough in the Chancery. And it is to wit that this statute shall hold place touching alienation of land contrary to the form of gift hereafter to be made, and shall not extend to gifts made before. And if a fine be levied hereafter upon such lands it shall be void in the law, neither shall the heirs or such as the reversion belongeth unto though they be of full age, within England, and out of prison, need to make their claim\(^1\).

It has been already observed\(^2\) that the Statute of Merton had no application where persons outside the manor and not

\(^1\) Except as regards the power of tenant in tail to alienate the inheritance, or to lose it by forfeiture or other involuntary alienation, an estate tail resembles an estate in fee simple. Tenant in tail is at liberty to see the land as he pleases, unlike tenant for life he is not liable for waste, he can cut timber, open mines, and generally deal with the land at his pleasure.
So the husband of tenant in tail, having had inheritable issue, is entitled to an estate by the curtesy, and the widow of tenant in tail to dower.

\(^2\) Chap. III. § 18 (2). tenants of the lord enjoyed, as appurtenant to their freehold tenements, rights of common of pasture over the wastes of the manor. The object of the following enactment was to extend the principles of the Statute of Merton to commoners having such rights of common. These rights of common are called rights of common appurtenant, as opposed to the rights of common of pasture enjoyed by the freehold tenants of the manor, which are rights of common appendant. It is worthy of observation that the rights of common here contemplated must have rested on ancient custom; it could not have been supposed by the framers of this Statute that the right had at some former date been granted by the lord, according to the theory of later lawyers.¹

Statute of Westminster II, 13 Edward I, c. 46.

Cum in statuto edito apud Merton, concessum fuerit, quod domini boscorum, pastorum, pasturarum, appræare² se posent de boscis, vastis et pasturis illis, non obstante contradictione tenentium suorum, dummodo tenentes ipsi haberent sufficientem pasturam ad tenementa sua, cum libero ingressu et egressu ad candem, et pro eo quod nulla fiesbat mentio inter vicinum et vicinum, multi domini boscorum, vastorum, et pasturarum, ducusque impediti extirpant per contradictionem vicinorum sufficientem pasturam habentium; et quia foris sic² tenentes non habent majus jus communicandi in boso, vasto, aut pastura alicuius domini, quam proprii tenentes ipsius domini; statutum est de caetero quod Statutum apud Merton prævisum inter dominum et tenentes suos locum habeat de caetero inter dominos boscorum, pastorum, et pasturarum, et vicinos, ita quod domini hujusmodi vastorum, boscorum, et pasturarum, salva sufficiens pastura hominibus suis et vicinis, appræare sibi possint de residuo. Et hoc observetur de his qui clamant pasturam tanquam pertinentem ad tenementa sua. Sed si quis clamat communam pasturam per speciale feoffamentum vel concessionem ad certum numerum averiorum, vel ali modo quam de jure communi habere deberet, cum conventio legi deroget, habeat suam recuperare, quale habere

¹ See above, p. 150.
² See Glossary, n. v.
³ Freetholders not tenants of the manor.
deberet per formam concessionis sibi factae. Occasionem molendini ventriticī, bercaiaei, vaccariaei, augmentationis curiae necessariae aut curtillagii, de caetero non gravetur quia per assisam novae disseisinæ de communa pasturae. Et cum contingat aliquando, quod aliquis jus habens appruare se, fossatum aut sepem levaverit, et aliqui notanter vel alio tali tempore, quo non credant factum suum scire, fossatum vel sepem prostraverint, nec sciri poterit per veredictum assiæae aut juratae qui fossatum aut sepem prostraverint, nec volint homines de villatis vicinis indici de hujusmodi facto culpabiles, distinguishing propinquae villaeæ circum adjacentes, levare fossatum aut sepem ad custum proprium, et damna restituere. Et cum aliquis jus non habens communicandi usurpet communam tempore quo haeredes extiterint infra aetatem, vel uxorres sub potestate virorum suorum existentes, vel pastura sit in manu tenentium in dotem, per legem Angliae, vel alter ad terminum vitae, vel annorum, vel per feudum talliæum, et pastura illa dixi usi fuerint, multi sunt in opinione quod hujusmodi pasturae debent de podi pertinere ad liberum tenementum, et quod hujusmodi possessori competere debet actio per breve novae disseisinæ, si hujusmodi pastura deforciatur; sed de caetero tenendum est quod habentes hujusmodi ingressum a tempore quo currit breve mortis antecessoris, si alia communam non habuerunt, non habeant recuperare per breve novae disseisinæ si fuerint deforciati.

TRANSLATION.

Whereas in a statute made at Merton it was granted that lords of wastes, woods, and pastures might approve the said wastes, woods, and pastures, notwithstanding the contradiction of their tenants, so that the tenants had sufficient pasture to their tenements, with free egress and regress to the same; and, forasmuch as no mention was made between neighbours and neighbours, many lords of wastes, woods, and pastures have been hindered heretofore by the contradiction of neighbours having sufficient pasture, and because foreign tenants have no more right to common

1 See above, Chap. III. § 16.
2 This is the earliest instance of the expression ‘estate tail.’ See above, p. 181.
3 That is, ‘a coronazione regis Henrici III.’ ‘But the said long possession is great evidence and strong presumption of the right of common, and stabilitur presumptioni donec probetur in contrarium.’ Coke, ad loc., 2nd Inst. p. 477. For the fiction by which continued enjoyment was held to be evidence of a grant, see above, p. 150.
in the wastes, woods, or pastures of any lord, than the lord's own tenants; it is ordained that the statute of Merton, provided between the lord and his tenants, from henceforth shall hold place between lords of wastes, woods, and pastures and their neighbours, having sufficient pasture to their tenants and neighbours, so that the lords of such wastes, woods, and pastures may make approvement of the residue, and this shall be observed for such as claim pasture as appurtenant to their tenements. But if any do claim common by special seoffment or grant for a certain number of beasts, or otherwise, which he ought to have of common right, whereas covenant barreth the law, he shall have such recovery as he ought to have had, by form of the grant made unto him. By occasion of a windmill, sheepcote, deyry, enlarging of a court necessary, or courtelage, from henceforth no man shall be grieved by assise of novel disseisin for common of pasture. And where sometime it chanceth, that one having right to approve doth then levy a dyke or an hedge, and some by night or at another season when they suppose not to be espied do overthrow the hedge or dyke, and it cannot be known by verdict of the assise or jury who did overthrow the hedge or dyke, and men of the towns near will not indict such as be guilty of the fact, the towns near adjoining shall be distrainted to levy the hedge or dyke at their own cost, and to yield damages. And where one, having no right to common, usurpeth common, what time an heir is within age, or a woman is covert, or while the pasture is in the hands of tenants in dower, by the courtesy, or otherwise, for term of life or years, or in fee tail, and have long time used the pasture, many hold opinion that such pastures ought to be said to belong to the freehold, and that the possessor ought to have action by a writ of novel disseisin if he be deforced of such pasture; but from henceforth this must be holden that such as have entered within the time that an assise of mortdauncean hath lien, if they had no common before, shall have no recovery by a writ of novel disseisin if they be deforced.

The history of the law of alienation has already been touched upon. We have seen that in the Anglo-Saxon time there was as a rule perfect freedom of alienation in the case of bookland. There does not appear to be any reason to suppose that this freedom of alienation, so far as it was effected inter vivos, was ever materially curtailed, until the passing of the Statute De Donis, except by the article of Magna Carta, already given, and the establishment of the right of the Crown to grant licences for alienation by tenants in capite. No licence was required by law as a condition of the validity of the alienation of lands held of a mesne lord. We gather indeed from Bracton that this freedom of alienation was a matter which was contested by the great lords in his day. In Bracton's view the lord could only fairly claim his service and homage. He must not push his rights further. The fact that it might be more advantageous to him to prevent a change of tenants was not sufficient to deprive the tenant of his right of alienation. Let the lord 'take that which was his and go his way.' It seems that at the beginning of the reign of Edward I the barons determined on attempting, where they could not prevent alienation altogether, at all events to diminish the loss sustained by the granting out of lands by their tenants to be held of themselves by sub-infeudation.

\[\text{1 See Chap. III. § 14.}\]

It seems that before the passing of this Statute, where A held land in fee simple of B, A might have granted to C the whole of these lands to be held of B; and such a grant would operate to create a tenancy between C and B. This relation, however, could not at the common law (that is, independently of the Statute presently to be mentioned) have been effected by a grant by A to C of part of the lands held by A. At common law, a feoffment made by A to C of a portion of his lands would in every case have created anew the relation of lord and tenant, with all the incidents attaching to that relation, as between A and C. In this case there would be no

1 See Chap. III. § 7.
3 'Tollat quod sumu fuerit et vadat.' Bracton, fol. 45; above, p. 122.
4 Coke's 2nd Inst. p. 65; and see above, p. 133.
QUIA EMPTORES.

immediate relation of lord and tenant between the chief lord and C. The advantageous rights of the lord over the land would consequently be diminished. The land thus aliened would not escheat to the chief lord on the failure of the heirs of the alienee, nor would the lord be the guardian of the lands or of the body of the heir.

To preserve these rights it was in the eighteenth year of Edward I enacted that every alienation in fee simple, whether of the whole or of a part of the land, should have the effect of substituting the alienee for the alienor in relation to the chief lord; the alienee simply stepping into the place of the alienor, and being subject to all the duties and obligations under which he held the land of his lord. The primary object of this enactment was to prevent the loss arising to the lords of manors from subinfeudation, or subdivision of the tenements held of them. Consequently, whenever at the present day a freehold tenant in fee simple holds of a mesne lord, the separation of the freehold from the domain must have occurred at a date anterior to the eighteenth year of Edward I. From this time forward every alienation of land in fee simple presents the characteristics of a complete out and out transfer, the transferee stepping for all purposes into the place of the transferor. Gradually by successive alienations the tie between the chief lord and the freeholder becomes weakened. In socage tenure, when no rent was payable and no value attached to the service, there was no motive for keeping up the empty ceremony of fealty, and thus in many cases the relation of lord and tenant became altogether obliterated. Finally, when all the valuable incidents attaching to knight-service were abolished and the tenure itself converted into socage by the Statute of Charles (12 Car. II, c. 24) the relation between the freeholder and his lord fell into abeyance, and the freeholder became for all practical purposes owner of the soil. Thus at the present day in the great majority of cases no intermediate lord is recognised between the freeholder and the crown, except where the freehold is within the known precincts of a manor, and the relation between the freetholder and the lord of the manor has been kept up by the recognition of mutual rights and duties, such as payment of rent, or rendering heriots or other duties to the lord.

Statutum Domini Regis de terris vendendis et emendis.

Quia emptores terrarum et tenementorum de feodis magnatum et aliquor in praecjudicium eorum temporis retroactis multotiens in feodis suis sunt ingressi, quibus libere tenentes eorum domini magnatum et aliorum terras et tenementa sua vendiderunt, tenenda in feodo sibi et haeredibus suis de foedorum suis et non de capitalibus dominis foedorum, per quod iidem capiories domini escetas, maritages, et custodias terrarum et tenementorum de feodis suis existentium saepius amiserunt, quod quidem eisdem magnatibus et alii dominis quam plurimum durum et difcile videbatur, et similiter in hoc casu exhaereditio manifesta; Dominus Rex in Parliamento suo apud Wmesterium post Pascha anno regni sui decimo octavo, videlicet in quindecim Sancti Jo-hannis Baptistae, ad instantiam magnatum regni sui, concessit, providit, et statuit, quod de cetero liceat unicusque libero homini terram suam seu tenementum sive partem inde pro voluntate sua vendere, its tamen quod foedatus tenat terram illam seu tenementum de codem capitali domino et per eadem servitut et con-sumptudines, per quae foedator suis illa prius tenue.

c. ii. Et si partem aliquam earundem terrarum seu tenementorum alicui vendiderit, foedatus illam tenet immediate de capitali domino, et oneretur statim de servitio quantum pertinent sive pertinere debet eodem domino pro particula illa, secundum quantitatem terrae seu tenementi venditi; et sic in hoc caso decidat capitali domino ipsa pars servitii capienda per manum foedatoris, ex quo foedatus debet eodem capitali domino juncta quantitatem terrae seu tenementi venditi de particula illa servitii sic debiti esse intendens et respondens.

c. iii. Et scindendum est quod per praeceditas venditiones sive emptiones terrarum seu tenementorum, seu partis alicujus eorum saepe modo possunt terrae seu tenements illa in parte vel in toto ad manum mortuam devenire arte vel ingeni contra

1 That is, the next immediate lord, of whom the foedator himself holds.
formam statuti super hoc dudum editi. Et sciendum quod istud statutum locum tenet de terris venditis tenendis in foedо simpliciter tantum; et quod se extendit ad tempus futurum. Et incipiet locum tenere ad festum Sancti Andreæ proximo futurum.

Translation.

c. i. Forasmuch as purchasers of lands and tenements of the fees of great men and other lords have many times heretofore entered into their fees, to the prejudice of the lords, to whom the freeholders of such great men have sold their lands and tenements to be holden in fee of their feoffors and not of the chief lords of the fees, whereby the same chief lords have many times lost their escheats, marriages, and wardships of lands and tenements belonging to their fees, which thing seems very hard and extreme unto those lords and other great men, and moreover in this case manifest disherittance, our lord the king in his parliament at Westminster after Easter the eighteenth year of his reign, that is to wit in the quinzine of Saint John Baptist, at the instance of the great men of the realm granted, provided, and ordained, that from henceforth it should be lawful to every freeman to sell at his own pleasure his lands and tenements or part of them, so that the feoffor shall hold the same lands or tenements of the chief lord of the same fee, by such service and customs as his feoffor held before.

c. ii. And if he sell any part of such lands or tenements to any, the feoffor shall immediately hold it of the chief lord, and shall be forthwith charged with the services for so much as pertaineth or ought to pertain to the said chief lord, for the same parcel, according to the quantity of the land or tenement so sold; and so in this case the same part of the service shall remain to

1 See Year Book, 22 Edward I, p. 64: ‘Note that a man may enfeoff another to hold to him and the heirs of his body begotten, to be holden of him (the feoffor) by a certain service by the year; and in this case there is no need that he be enfeoffed to hold of the chief lord of the fee: for the Statute Quia Emptores terrarum etc. is understood of the case of one enfeoffing another in fee simple and not in fee tail. Hence, if a tenant in fee simple makes an alienation for an estate tail, or an estate for life, the tenant in tail or the tenant for life holds of the alienor in respect of his reversion in fee. It is otherwise, however, if the alienor parts with his whole estate, leaving no reversion in himself; as for instance, if he grants an estate by way of remainder in fee expectant on the determination of the estate for life, or in tail. (Coke’s 2nd Inst. p. 504.)
the lord, to be taken by the hands of the feoffee, for which he ought to be attendant and answerable to the same chief lord according to the quantity of the land or tenement sold for the parcel of the service so due.

§ 5. c. iii. And it is to be understood that by the said sales or purchases of lands or tenements, or any parcel of them, such lands or tenements shall in no wise come into mortmain, either in part or in whole, neither by policy ne craft, contrary to the form of the statute made thereupon of late. And it is to wit that this statute extendeth but only to lands holden in fee simple, and that it extendeth to the time coming. And it shall begin to take effect at the Feast of Saint Andrew the Apostle next coming.

The effect of the Statute of Quia Emptores upon the form of charters of feoffment can be clearly traced by comparing the following form with that given above 1.

Sciunt praesentes et futuri quod Ego Johannes Ely de Sheldone dedi concessi et hac praesenti carta mea confirmavi Domino Willielmo de Chameles de Bedeworth totum pratum meum quod habui de Willielmo de Burthate cum fossis et hayis libertatis et cum omnibus suis pertinentiis et emolumentiis quae aliquo modo seu causa de dicto prato mihi vel haeredibus meis accidisse potuissent . . . . . . . . . . . .

Habendum et tenendum praedictum pratum cum omnibus suis pertinentiis praedictis sibi dicto Willielmo et haeredibus suis et suis assignatis, de capitalibus dominis feodi, libere, haereditarie, pacifice, et in perpetuum quiete, reddendo et faciendo eisdem servicia eis inde debita et consuetud.

1 Chapter I. p. 50.

2 If a rent be reserved to the grantor, as was not uncommon, this cannot operate as the creation of a rent service, for that would be contrary to the Statute. If, however, the grant be in tail or for life a rent service may be created; for the Statute is no bar to the creation of a tenure as between the reversioner in fee and the tenant of a smaller or particular feehold estate. Where a rent service is created, the lord or reversioner has always the right to distrain for the rent in arrear. Where on a grant in fee simple a rent is reserved to the grantor, this is not a rent service but a rent charge. It is in fact equivalent to a re-grant from the donee in fee simple of a charge upon the lands. In order to give the person entitled to the rent the right to distrain, it was necessary, before the Statute 4 George II, c. 28, that there should be a special clause in the deed by which the rent is created to that effect. If there was no clause of distress the rent was called a rent seek (reditus siccus). The appropriate remedy for the recovery of a rent, before the abolition of real actions, was by Assize of Novel Disceisin.
et haereses mei et mei assignati praedictum pratum cum fossis et lavis et cum omnibus suis pertinentiis prout supradictum est praedicto Willielmo et haeredibus suis et suis assignatis warranti-zetabimus acquietabimus et in perpetuum defendemus.

Hii testibus etc.

Datum apud Oldecotenale die Sabbati proxima post purifi-cationem beatae Marie Virginis, anno regni Regis Edwardi vicesimo quarto.—Mados, Formulare Anglicanum, No. ccxxxi.
CHAPTER V.

COMPLETION OF THE COMMON OR EARLIER LAW.

CHAP. V. By the end of the reign of Edward I the main outlines of the law relating to land are complete. There is no statute producing an organic change in the law, such as was effected by the statutes of De Donis and Quia Emptores, till the reign of Henry VIII. During the period extending from the reign of Edward I to the reign of Henry VIII, the changes in the law are to be looked for chiefly in the action of the regular tribunals, and in the growth of a wholly new set of principles affecting land created by the new jurisdiction of the Chancellor. The latter will be discussed in the next chapter. The present will be confined to an examination of the development of certain particular classes of rights during the period above mentioned.

The sources of our knowledge of the law for this period are (1) the official reports of cases decided by the common law tribunals contained in the Year Books; (2) authoritative

1 The reports in the Year Books are written in the strange jargon called law-French. Documents such as records of proceedings in court, charters, the text of statutes (most commonly, see above, p. 168), were in Latin. French was formerly the oral language in which all viva voce proceedings were conducted. By 36 Edward III, Stat. 1, c. 15, after reciting that a reason why the laws were so ill obeyed was that they were 'pleaded, showed, and judged in the French tongue, which was much unknown in the realm, so LEASEHOLD INTERESTS.

§ 1. Leasehold Interests.

The early history of leasehold interests or estates for years has already been noticed, and reference has been made to the change effected in the reign of Henry III, by which leasehold interests were erected into a distinct kind of estate or property in land. This interest or property is less than freehold, it is wanting in the great characteristic of freehold—uncertainty as to the period at which the rights will come to an end. It is essential to a leasehold, or, as it is often called, a chattel interest in land, that the period of its termination should be fixed from the beginning, or at least be capable of being fixed.

The rights under consideration present characteristics wholly different to freehold interests as to the mode in which they are created, the kind of interest which may be given, the mode in which they devolve on the death of the person entitled, and the remedy by which the right is vindicated.

The proper mode of granting an estate for years at common CHAP. V. law¹ is by words of demise followed by the entry of the lessee.

§ 1. The appropriate words of the grant are demissi concessi et ad firmam tradidi—demise, grant, and to farm let. The lessee is sometimes called the termor, sometimes, from the main object of the transaction, the farmer.

It was not necessary that the words of demise should be in writing until the passing of the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. II, c. 3), which rendered writing necessary for the validity of all leases, except those for a term not exceeding three years, and fulfilling certain conditions as to rent.

In order to complete the interest of the lessee, it is, at common law, necessary that the words of demise should be followed by his entry on the lands. The words of demise, spoken or written, confer a right to enter, technically called an interesse termini, but the lessee does not become actually tenant in possession until he has made entry upon the land demised.

Leasehold interests, requiring no livery of seisin, may at common law be created so as to take effect in possession or enjoyment at a future time. This is impossible in freehold interests except in the case of remainders². A lease to commence next Christmas conveys a perfect right to the lessee to enter at Christmas, and to hold for the specified term.

Again, leasehold interests are not subject to the rules affecting the devolution of freehold interests. Before the change recorded by Bracton³, the only parties who could under any circumstances have claimed the benefits of a lease on the death of the lessee were his executors or administrators⁴;

¹ In this chapter the expression 'common law' is applied to the rules of the older law, which have in some cases been modified or supplemented by subsequent legislation, to be afterwards noticed.
² See below, § 3.
³ See above, Chap. III. § 17.
⁴ The administrator is the person appointed, formerly by the Ecclesiastical Court, now by the Court of Probate, to administer and distribute the personal property of the intestate.
and that only when the lease rested on an express covenant by deed. Hence, when leasehold interests became rights of property (or rights available not only against the lessor, but also against all the world), it was natural that they should not be brought under the rule of primogeniture, but should pass under the will to the executors of the deceased, or, in the case of intestacy, to the administrator, with the rest of the chattels. Thus leasehold interests came to be classed with personal property. Since however they are rights over things immoveable, they received the mongrel name of 'chattels real,' and cannot be excluded from a treatise professing to deal with real property.

The nature of the remedy provided for the ejected leaseholder, _contra quoscunque dejectores_, has already been stated. The writ of _ejectio firmae_, however, left the lessee without remedy in two cases. First, not having the freehold, he was liable to be ousted by the successful plaintiff in a collusive action against the lessor, in which the lessor allowed judgment to go against him by default, or, as it was technically called, suffered a recovery. A partial remedy for this injustice was provided by the Statute of Gloucester, but the leaseholder was not wholly protected against a proceeding of this nature till the Statute 21 Henry VIII, c. 15. Secondly, if the lessor ejected the lessee, and then enfeoffed a third person, the lessee could not bring his writ of _ejectio firmae_ against the feoffee, because he was not the ejector; nor against the lessor, because he was not in possession. A further remedy was therefore necessary, and a writ was devised called the writ of _quare ejectit infra terminum_, which was available in the case supposed against the feoffee.

Thus the interest of the lessee for years was gradually protected at all points, and took its place as a distinct class of rights of property.

---

1 See Chap. III. § 17.

3 See Fitzherbert, Natura Brevium, 198 a.
An important class of interests, of the nature of estates for years, should be mentioned here. These are estates at will, estates from year to year, and estates at sufferance.

A tenancy at will is where the land is held by the tenant so long as lessor and lessee please that the tenancy should continue. No notice from either party is necessary to terminate a tenancy at will strictly so called; any act by either party, affording to the other proper evidence of his determination that the tenancy should no longer continue, is sufficient. The chief characteristics of this tenancy will be found in the extract from Littleton given below.

The inconveniences of tenancies at will induced the tribunals to provide some means of giving greater security to a tenant who held under no regular lease for years. The circumstances of the letting—especially the character of the rent, whether payable yearly, half-yearly, quarterly, or otherwise—are looked to, in order to ascertain the nature of the interest which the parties intended to create. Most commonly the reservation of an annual rent and payment of any part of it is held to constitute what is called a tenancy from year to year. Such a tenancy can usually be put an end to only at the end of the current year of the tenancy, by either party giving at least half a year’s previous notice to quit. Other modifications of tenancies at will, such as quarterly, monthly, or weekly tenancies, can be created, depending in each case upon evidence as to the terms of the letting.

Tenant at sufferance is where a lessee whose term has expired holds on after its expiration. He is in the position of one who has come in rightfully, but holds on without any right. He cannot however be treated as a trespasser

1 'This kind of lease was in use as long ago as the reign of Henry VIII.' Blackstone, ii. p. 147, note, citing Year Book, T. 13 Hen. VIII, 15, 16. The requisite length of notice was altered in the case of agricultural or pastoral tenancies by the Agricultural Holdings Act 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 92) to one year; and this provision is re-enacted subject to variation by agreement in the Agricultural Holdings Act 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 61).
by the true owner before entry made upon him. Any recognition by the owner will convert him into a tenant at will; and, if he has held previously under a regular lease, it requires but slight evidence to lead to the inference that a tenant at sufferance has been converted into a tenant from year to year on the terms of his previous holding so far as they are applicable.

Terms of Years.

Britton, lib. v. chap. xiv. § 8. Cee mot, terme, se estent ausi bien a terme de vie cum a terme des aunz. Mes cil qui ne lest for qe a terme des aunz, tut feist il le les a terme de c. aunz, si il ne lest for qe les espelez, et retient vers ly le fee et le dret et le fraunc tenement, si avaunt le les le out; et cee qe il retiet lerra a soen heur cum il morra; ou sauntz tort fere al fermer porra il doner et aliener a estrange persone; ou al fermer mesmes porra il relesser chescune manere de dret et quite-clamer, et feffer, sauntz oster primes le fermer de sa seisme tele quale; et aussi ne porra il mie fere a autre estrange persone, si le fermer de soen gré ne se cheve al purchaceour; car la seisme del aliener sei continoue touz jours par le fermer, qui use sa seisme en le noun soen lessour.

Translation.

The word 'term' extends as well to a term of life as to a term of years. But he who leases only for a term of years,

1 See above, Chap. IV. p. 167. The text and translation are taken from Nichols' edition.

2 The fermer or lessee is not seised, for he has no freehold interest (see above, p. 134), but is only possessed; nor is the freeholder actually seised, for he has parted with the possession. 'The possession of the termor or lessee constitutes the seisin of the freeholder.' Hence the reversion lies in grant, not in livery; i.e. can be granted by deed with attornment (see next note). At the same time the freeholder can, with the consent of the lessee, come on the land and make livery of the freehold to a third person; in which case the freehold in possession passes, and not merely the reversion.

3 Until the Statute 4 Anne, c. 16, ss. 9, 10, the grant of a freehold reversion expectant on a term of years must have been completed by the attornment or acknowledgment of the grantee by tenant for years. The necessity of attornment was done away with by that Statute.
although he make the lease for a term of a hundred years, leases the profits only, and retains to himself the fee and the right and the frank tenement, if he had them before the lease; and all that he retains he will leave at his death to his heir, or he may, without doing any wrong to the farmer, give and alien it to a stranger; or he may release and quit claim every sort of right to the farmer himself, and enfeoff him, without first outing the farmer of his seizin, such as it is. This he cannot do to a stranger, unless the farmer of his own consent will attorn to the purchaser; for the seizin of the alienor is all along continued by the farmer who enjoys his seizin in the name of his lessor.

LITTLETON's TENURES, lib. i. chap. vii. sect. 58. Tenant for Term of Years. Tenoant pur terme dez ans est lou home less terres ou tenementes a un autre pur terme de corteins ans solonques le nombre dez ans que est accorde perentre le lessor et le lessé: et quant le lessé entra per force de le lees, donques il est tenaunt pur terme dez ans. Et si le lessor en tiel cas reserva a luy un annuelli rente sur tiel lees, il poet enlier a distreignier pur le rente en les tenementes lessez, ou il poet aver una accion de dette pur les arreages envers le lessee.

Sect. 59. Et est assavoir, que en lees pur terme dez ans per fait ou sauns fait, il ne besoigne ascun liveré de seizin destre fait a le lessé, mes il poet entrer quanques il voet per force de mesme le lees. Mes de feoffementes faitz en pays, ou dones en le taille, ou leses pur terme de vie, en tielx cases ou franktenement passera, si cec soit per fait ou sauns fait, il covient daver un liveré de seizin.

Sect. 60. Mes si home less terrez ou tenementes per fait, ou sauns fait, a un pur terme dez ans, le remaindre oultre a un autre pur terme de vie, ou en le taille, ou en lee, donques en tiel case il covient que le lessor faitz un liveré de seizin a le lesse pur terme dez ans, ou autrement riens passera a ceux en le remaindre, comen que le lessee entra en les tenementes. Et si le termor en tiel cas entra devant ascun liveré de seizin fait a luy, donques est le franktenement et auxi la revercion en le lessor: mes si soit fait liveré de seizin a le lessee, donques est le franktenement ove le fee a ceux en le remaindre, solonques la fourme del graunt et la volunte de le lessor.

Chap. viii. sect. 68. Tenoant a volonte est ou terres ou tenementes sont lesses per un home a un autre, a aver et tener a luy
AUTHORITIES AS TO LEASEHOLD INTERESTS.  203

a la volunte le lessour, per force de quel loes le lessé est en possessione, en tiet cas le lessé est appelle tenant a volunte, pur cee que il nad aucun certeyn sure estate, car le lessour luy post onstre a quel temps quil luy pleroit: unquore si le lessé embleia la terre, et le lessour apres lembleier, et devaunt que les blees sont mature s luy custa, unquore le lessé avera les blees, et avera frank entre, egresse, et regresse a seier et de carrier les blees, pur cee que il ne savoit a quel temps son lessour voilloit enterre sur luy. Autre ment est si tenant pur terme dez ans qui conust le fyn de son terme embleia la terre, et le terme est fynye devaunt que les blees sont mature; en cee cas le lessour, ou celui en le reversion avera les blees, pur cee que le termour bien conust le certeynte de son terme et quant sa terme serroit fynye.

SIR E. COKE'S TRANSLATION.

Chap. vii. sect. 58. Tenant for term of years is where a man letteth lands or tenements to another for term of certain years, after the number of years that is accorded between the lessor and the lessee. And when the lessee entereth1 by force of the lease, then is he tenant for term of years; and if the lessor in such case reserve to him a yearly rent upon such lease, he may choose for to distraint2 for the rent in the tenements letten, or else he may have an action of debt for the arrearages against the lessee. . . .

Sect. 59. And it is to be understood, that in a lease for years, by deed or without deed, there needs no livery of seizin to be made to the lessee, but he may enter whenever he will by force of the same lease. But of feoffments made in the country3, or gifts in tail, or leases for term of life; in such cases where a frehold shall pass, if it be by deed or without deed, it behoveth to have livery of seizin.

1 Entry is necessary in order to complete the interest of the lessee. Before entry the lessee has an interest called an interesse termini, that is, an indefeasible right of entry, which may be asserted by his executors or administratores if he die without having entered.

2 The right to distraint for rent in arrear is incidental to the relation of lessor and lessee. Whatever moveable things are upon the demised tenements, whether belonging to the lessee or not, are liable to distress, with certain specified exceptions—beasts of the plough, materials used in trade, etc. See Coke upon Littleton, 47 a.

3 A conveyance 'en pais' is an ordinary conveyance, see Chap. III. § 12, as opposed to a conveyance by fine, recovery, etc.
CHAP. V. Sect. 60. But if a man leteth lands or tenements, by deed or without deed, for term of years, the remainder over to another for life, or in tail, or in fee, in this case it behoveth that the lessor maketh livery of seisin to the lessee for years, otherwise nothing passeth to them in the remainder, although that the lessee enter into the tenements. And if the termor in this case entereth before any livery of seisin made to him, then is the freehold and also the reversion in the lessor. But if he maketh livery of seisin to the lessee, then is the freehold together with the fee to them in the remainder, according to the form of the grant and the will of the lessor.

Chap. viii. sect. 68. Tenant at will is, where lands or tenements are let by one man to another, to have and to hold to him at the will of the lessor, by force of which lease the lessee is in possession. In this case the lessee is called tenant at will because he hath no certain nor sure estate, for the lessor may put him out at what time it pleaseth him. Yet if the lessee soweth the land, and the lessor, after it is sown and before the corn is ripe, put him out, yet the lessee shall have the corn, and shall have free entry, egress, and regress to cut and carry away the corn, because he knew not at what time the lessor would enter upon him. Otherwise it is, if tenant for years, which knoweth the end of his term, doth sow the land, and his term endeth before the corn is ripe; in this case the lessor or he in the reversion shall have

1 See below, § 3.
2 This estate is at the will of both parties, and therefore the lessee, like the lessor, can put an end to it without notice.
3 ‘And this is not only proper to a lessee at will, that when the lessor determines his will that the lessee shall have the corn sown etc., but to every particular tenant that hath an estate uncertain, for that is the reason which Littleton expresseth in those words ‘because he hath no certain nor sure estate’; and therefore if tenant for life soweth the ground and dieth, his executors shall have the corn, for that his estate was uncertain and determined by the act of God. And the same law is of the lessee for years of tenant for life. . . . If tenant pur terme d’autre vie soweth the ground and esty que vie dieth, the lessee shall have the corn. . . . But if the lessee at will sow the ground with corn etc., and after he himself determine his will and refuse to occupy the ground, in that case the lessor shall have the corn, because he loseth his rent. And if a woman that holdeth land durante viduitate sua soweth the ground and taketh husband, the lessor shall have the emblements, because that the determination of her own estate grew by her own act.’ Coke, Comment. ad loc. 55 b. The crops to which a tenant whose estate is terminated is thus entitled are called emblements. See Blackstone, ii. pp. 122, 145.
the corn, because the lessee knew the certainty of his term, and when it would end.

§ 2. Estates Tail.

'Tenant in fee tail,' says Littleton¹, 'is by force of the Statute of Westminster II, cap. 1.' The mode in which that Statute created what was in effect a new species of estate has already been explained. The various attributes of estates tail became the constant subject of judicial decision, and introduced a vast amount of complexity into the law relating to land. The tendency of the courts was to extend the provisions of the Statute so as to embrace other cases besides those mentioned in its text. Wherever to the words of inheritance were added words of procreation,—wherever it was expressed directly or indirectly that the lands were to go to the heirs who were the issue of the body of the donee, the case was held to fall within the limits of the Statute.²

There were four principal classes of estates tail recognised: estates in tail general, estates in tail special, estates in tail male, and estates in tail female. An estate in tail general was where an estate was given to a man or woman and the heirs of his or her body generally, the estate descended to the legitimate descendants of the donee without restriction to the issue of any particular marriage. An estate in special tail was where the lands were descenidable only to a limited class of lineal descendants, as where lands were given to A

¹ See Sect. 13.
² See Chap. IV. § 3.
³ "If therefore either the words of inheritance or the words of procreation be omitted, albeit the others are inserted in the grant, this will not make an estate tail. As if the grant be to a man and the issue of his body, to a man and his seed, to a man and his children, or offspring; all these are only estates for life, there wanting the words of inheritance, his heirs. So on the other hand a gift to a man, and his heirs male, or female, is an estate in fee simple, and not in fee tail; for there are no words to ascertain the body out of which they shall issue. Indeed, in last wills and testaments, wherein greater indulgence is allowed, an estate tail may be created by a devise to a man and his seed, or to a man and his heirs male; or by other irregular modes of expression." Blackstone, ii. p. 115. See Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 41), sect. 51. and the heirs of his body by C his present wife. If no such heirs were born, the estate on the death of A reverted to the donor; and as on the death of C the wife without issue this must necessarily be the case, A becomes, after that event, what is technically called ‘tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct.’ Gifts in frank-marriage differed only from these gifts in special tail in being free from all liability to service to the donor until the fourth generation of tenants.

An estate in tail male was where by the form of the gift the descent was restricted to lineal male descendants. An estate in tail female was where the descent was restricted to lineal female descendants. These two latter classes of entails, though not within the express words of the Statute of Westminster II, were recognised, according to Littledon, by the equity of the Statute.

Inasmuch as the estate of tenant in tail was, according to the metaphorical expression of the lawyers, ‘carved out of,’ that is, less than an estate in fee simple and different from it, it followed that if tenant in fee simple made a gift in tail, such a gift was not within the Statute of Quia Emptores, but a tenure was created between tenant in tail and tenant in fee simple, the former holding of the latter.

1 Littledon, sects. 16, 17, 19.
2 This was settled in a case which arose in 18 Edward III (Year Book, p. 46). Gift to A and the heirs male of his body. A had issue a daughter, who had issue a son; question, whether A’s grandson could succeed per formam doni. Held that he could not, the gift being of a more restricted character than an estate which is given generally to heirs of the body.
(Reeves, ii. p. 336.)
3 Sect. 21. When a particular case does not fall within the express terms of a statute, but the judge, conceiving that the legislator in pursuance of his general design would have embraced the case if it had been present to his mind, acts as if it was covered by the statute, the case is said to fall within the ‘equity of the statute.’ See Austin, ii. p. 396.
4 An estate tail is said to be less than a fee simple, because the law regards as a disposable interest the possibility of enjoying the lands after the determination, by failure of issue or otherwise, of the estate tail. There is no estate larger than a fee simple, because the law does not regard the possibility of the enjoyment of the estate after the failure of heirs general as a disposable interest. Littledon, sect. 18.
5 Littledon, sect. 19.
It must be borne in mind that estates tail are only known in freehold interests, and that there can be no estate tail in a chattel-interest, such as a term of years.

The history of the alienation of estates tail is connected with the difficult and obsolete doctrine of warranty, of which the Courts took advantage to break in upon the policy of the law as conceived by the great barons who procured the enactment of the Statute of Westminster II. The effect of a warranty accompanying a gift of an estate of inheritance was to oblige the warrantor or donor to defend the possession of his donee. If the donee was ousted by a claimant establishing a superior title, the warrantor was bound to give the donee or his representatives lands of value equal to those of which he had been deprived. The burden of this obligation would descend to the heirs of the warrantor (at least to the extent of preventing the heir from disputing his ancestor’s gift), and the benefit of it to the heirs of the donee. This principle would have been sufficient, if applied to estates tail, to have enabled a tenant in tail, by alienating his land with a warranty, to have given the purchaser an estate which his heir could not defeat. It seems, however, to have been held early in the reign of Edward II that, if tenant in tail aliened the land with warranty, the heir of the tenant in tail was not bound by his ancestor’s alienation and warranty (that is, could defeat the estate of the donee or his heirs by claiming in opposition to the gift of the ancestor), unless he had assets (lands in fee simple equivalent to those which had been granted away) by descent from his ancestor. On the other hand, if he had assets, the ordinary rule prevailed, and the heir of the warrantor was bound by his ancestor’s war-

1 For the early history of the doctrine of warranty see above, p. 72, n. 2.
2 Littleton, sect. 697.
3 Reeves, ii. pp. 200, 203.
4 Littleton, sect. 712. Reeves shows (ii. p. 204) that this rule of law is probably an extension of the provision of the Statute of Gloucester (6 Edward I, c. 3) as to alienation of tenants by the curtesy. See Littleton, sect. 724.
And if the warrantor was a prior tenant in tail, who had died without issue, upon which, according to the limitations of the estate, the land went over to a subsequent tenant in tail, such last tenant in tail was bound by the warranty of his predecessor, even though there were no assets. This was called collateral as opposed to lineal warranty.¹

The doctrine that the issue of the tenant in tail was bound by his ancestor’s alienation with warranty only in cases where he had assets by descent, greatly narrowed the power of effectual alienation possessed by the tenant in tail. And it must be remembered that even where such alienation was binding on the issue, it would not bind the lord or donor so as to bar him of his reversion² in the event of the failure of issue of the donee in tail.

Thus the Statute de Donis, as interpreted by the Courts, put an effectual check to the practice of free alienation of estates, where, as was commonly the case, words of procreation were added to the words of inheritance.

As time went on, the great inconvenience of such a restriction was strongly felt. Titles were insecure, for an old entail, of which nothing was known, might be brought to light; nor would any period of enjoyment, however long, afford an answer to such a claim. ‘Farmers were ousted of their leases, creditors defrauded of their debts.’ The free alienation of land was restrained, a grievance which was probably felt with increasing severity in consequence of the impoverishment of the landowners caused by the wars of the Roses. The king, too, suffered by the protection against forfeiture which the practice afforded to the issue of a traitor. Thus all members of the community, except perhaps the great landowners themselves, were interested in obtaining a relaxation of the practice of strictly entailing lands which had

¹ Reeves, ii. p. 340.
² And this reversion is now a definite estate or interest, not a mere possibility of the lands escheating. It is a reversion in fee expectant on the determination of the estate tail. See below, § 3.
grew up under the provisions of the Statute of Westminister II.

Although feigned recoveries, or fictitious suits in which a writ of right was brought by a third person against the tenant, who thereupon suffered judgment to pass against him, had long been known as a mode of conveying lands, it was for some time thought that the heir of tenant in tail was not bound by a judgment so obtained against his ancestor. In the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V some doubts began to be entertained whether a recovery suffered by tenant in tail was not good against the issue. These doubts continued without being finally determined during the reign of Henry VI. They were at length set at rest by the introduction of a series of fictions, by virtue of which it was feigned that a gift with warranty had been made by the original donor of the tenant in tail, that a claim was made to the lands by a person having a title superior to that of the original donor, and that tenant in tail received from the original donor an equivalent for the lands of which he was deprived by the judgment. Further, the supposed original donor was made a party to the suit, and, upon his failing to

---

1 'But the true policy and rule of the common law in this point was in effect overthrown by the Statute de Donis Conditionalibus, which established a general perpetuity by Act of Parliament for all who had or would make it, by force whereof all the possessions in England in effect were entailed accordingly, which was the occasion and cause of the said and divers other mischiefs. And the same was attempted and endeavoured to be remedied at divers parliaments, and divers bills were exhibited accordingly (which I have seen), but they were always on one pretence or another rejected. But the truth was that the lords and commons, knowing that their estates tail were not to be forfeited for felony or treason, as their estates of inheritance were before the said Act (and chiefly in the time of Hen. III, in the Barons' War), and finding that they were not answerable for the debts or inembrazures of their ancestors, nor did the sales, alienations, or leases of their ancestors bind them for the lands which were entailed to their ancestors, they always rejected such bills, and the same continued in the residue of the reign of E. I and the reigns of E. II, E. III, R. II, H. IV, H. V, and H. VI, till about the 12th year of E. IV,' etc. Sir Anthony Mildmay's Case, Coke's Reports, 6. 40 a. See Blackstone, ii. 116.

2 Reeves, ii. 575.
CHAP. V. defend his fictitious gift, he and his heirs were barred of their reversion. This was the course adopted, though possibly not for the first time, in the famous ‘Taltarum’s Case’ (12 Edward IV). A translation of the pleadings is given below. From this time till 1834 (3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 74) it became the common practice for tenant in tail to ‘suffer a recovery;’ that is, by a proceeding similar to that adopted in Taltarum’s case, to convert his estate into a fee simple. In effect, therefore, wherever an estate tail was given, tenant in tail might, so soon as he came of age, by this process give to another an estate in fee simple, which by arrangement might then be re-conveyed to himself, and thus he was enabled to cut off; bar, or defeat the expectations of his own issue, and the interests of all persons claiming after him in remainder or reversion. After a statute passed in the reign of Henry VIII, the same result might have been effected by a fine.

By the above-mentioned statute (3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 74) fines and recoveries were abolished, and tenant in tail may now, by a deed enrolled in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, alienate his lands for any estate in fee simple or otherwise, and thus defeat the expectations of his own issue and of all remainder-men and reversioners.

The only additional restriction imposed upon the alienation of an estate tail is that the consent of the person who is called the Protector of the settlement is necessary to its being effectually barred. The Protector of the settlement is usually the tenant for life in possession; but the settlor of the lands may appoint in his place any number of persons not exceeding three to be together Protector during the continuance of the estates preceding the estate tail. The practical effect

1 See above, p. 185.
2 Except that in the case of a lease not exceeding twenty-one years at a rack-rent, or not less than five-sixths of a rack-rent, no enrolment is necessary. Sect. 41.
3 Or persons entitled to a remainder or reversion. See § 3.
4 Sect. 32.
TALTARUM'S CASE.

therefore of an estate tail at the present day is to prevent CHAP. V.
the alienation of lands for a valid estate of inheritance in all cases till tenant in tail comes of age. After this, his power of disposing of the lands differs from that of tenant in fee simple only in the mode in which it is exercised, and in the necessity, where the estate is not in possession, for the consent of the Protector. There is a special exception in the Statute of tenants in tail after possibility of issue extinct.

Translation of the Pleadings in Taltarum's Case.

YEAR BOOK, 12 EDWARD IV, 19.

In a Writ of Entry on the Statute of Richard, "Ubiquus ingressus non datur per legem etc.," sued against one J. Smith, the defendant said that the plaintiff ought not to have his action, for that before the alleged entry one T. B. was seised of the tenements etc. in fee, and gave them to one W. Smith to have and to hold to him and the heirs of his body begotten; by force whereof he was seised, and had issue one Richard, and died seised, and the tenements descended to Richard; and he entered and was seised, and had issue the said J. Smith, and died seised, and the tenements descended to the said J.; and the plaintiff claiming by colour of a deed of feoffment before the gift etc. entered, upon whose possession the said J., as son and heir of the said R. at the time of the alleged entry, entered, etc.; upon which entry the plaintiff

1 It is almost the universal practice, when lands are brought into strict settlement upon a marriage, to give an estate for life to the husband, followed by an estate tail to the eldest (unborn) son. Consequently the lands cannot be alienated for an estate in fee simple until the son attains the age of twenty-one. In order to effect an alienation then, it is necessary that father and son should both join. The lands, if not alienated, are the freehold of the father for his life, the son having the inheritance. The effect of such an arrangement upon family relations is a point worthy of the consideration of the legislature, in considering the important question of the retention of estates tail as an interest recognised by law.
2 § 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 74, s. 18.
3 § 5 R. II, c. 8.
4 Defendant justifies the entry by showing a title derived from T. B., who enfeoffed W. S. for an estate in tail general, from whom the lands descended through R. to the defendant.
§ 2.

has grounded this action. To which the plaintiff says that well and true it is that the said T. R. gave the tenements ut supra etc.; but he says that the said W. had issue one Humphrey the elder (son), and the said R. the younger, and died; after whose death H. entered and was seised by form of the gift etc.; and being so seised, one T. Taltarum sued a writ of right against the said Humphrey, returnable etc. On which day the parties appeared, and the said T. Taltarum counted of his possession, and the said H. made defence, and vouched to warranty one R. King, who was ready, and entered into the warranty, and joined issue on the mere right; and the said Taltarum impard (with him), and then returned (into court), and the tenant by the warranty did not return, but in contempt of court made default, by which the said T. T. had final judgment against the said H., and he over against the tenant by the warranty, by force whereof the said Taltarum entered and was seised etc.; and then the said H. died without heir of his body, and then Taltarum enfeofed the present plaintiff, whereby he was seised when the defendant entered. To which the defendant said, that well and true it is that the said W. had issue Humphrey the elder and R. the younger, and died; and that after his death the tenements descended to Humphrey as son and heir, and he entered and was seised as son and heir by the form of the gift etc. But he says that the afore-

1 The plaintiff, in order to displace the title thus set up by the defendant, replies that W. S. had an elder son, H., to whom the lands descended, that Taltarum brought a writ of right against H., that H. vouched R. K. to warranty, that R. K. made default, that Taltarum consequently recovered against H., became seised, and enfeofed the plaintiff.

2 This is the narratio, count, or formal statement of the plaintiff’s claim in his ‘declaration.’

3 That is, by leave of the Court the two parties retire to discuss the matter.

4 For the recovery of lands of equal value by way of compensation.

5 The defendant rejoins that before Taltarum’s proceedings H. made a gift to Tregos in fee (which would be a valid conveyance though liable to be avoided after H’s death, see above, p. 180), that Tregos availed himself of this grant for the purpose of giving back to H. and his wife an estate in special tail, which by the death of the wife became an estate tail after possibility of issue extinct (above, p. 206), that Taltarum’s proceedings defeated only the last-mentioned estate, and that after the death of H., R. entered as heir of the body of W. S. by virtue of the gift made to W. S. by T. B.

6 The defendant by this pleading does not question the effect of the recovery by Taltarum, but sets up other matter, namely, a prior alienation.
said Humfrey, before the writ purchased¹ etc., enfeoffed one Tregos of the said lands in fee etc.; the which Tregos, before the writ purchased, gave the tenements to the said H. and to one Jane his wife, to have and to hold to them and to the heirs of their bodies begotten, the remainder to the right heirs of the said H. in fee etc., by force of which they were seized etc., and then Jane died, after whose death H. was sole seised of the said tenements as tenant in tail after possibility (of issue extinct). And, while he was so seised, the said Taltarum sued the said writ of right, and recovered against the said H. in the manner and form as alleged; the which H. continually after the said judgment during his life was seised of the said tenements by force of the gift made to him and to his wife, and died without heir of his body. After whose death the said R., as brother and heir of the said H. begotten of the body of W., entered and was seized by force of the gift made to W., and died seised; and the tenements descended to the said J. Smith, and he entered and was seised by force of the gift etc.; without this², that the said T. Taltarum, after the said recovery in the life of the said H., entered on the said tenements, as he has alleged; and without this, that the said H. had any other estate in the said tenements on the day of the purchase of the writ of right or afterwards, except that by force of the gift made to him and to his wife etc.; and without this, that the said Taltarum was seised of the said tenements as of fee and of right in the time of the king, as he has alleged, and that the said recovery is false and feigned in law³.

in fee by Humfrey, and a re-grant in special tail by the feoffee to Humfrey and his wife. His contention is, that it is this estate only which is defeated by Taltarum’s recovery, and not the original estate tail given to W. Smith.

¹ That is, before Taltarum’s suit. ‘Purchasing’ a writ was the usual expression for commencing an action by suing out a writ, for which the usual fees must be paid, notwithstanding the provision of Magna Carta (c. 40), ‘Nulli vendemus rectum aut justitiam.’

² ‘Abique hoc.’ The technical term by which the denial of a material allegation of the plaintiff was introduced in the kind of plea called a special traverse. The defendant denies that there was any such recovery by Taltarum as that alleged in the plaintiff’s replication, except the recovery stated and admitted in the preceding part of the defendant’s rejoinder. This, with other like mysteries of the older form of pleading, was made unnecessary by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 and 16 Vict. c. 70).

³ The important point in these pleadings is the allegation of the recovery by Taltarum on the default of King, who had been vouched to warranty.
§ 3. Interests in Future. Reversions and Remainders.

In close connexion, speaking historically, with the doctrine of estates tail, is that of future interests or estates in ex-

The fiction is that King is the donor, and that he had made the original gift in tail with warranty, and in consequence of his being vouched, and accepting the challenge, he is in effect substituted as the defendant in Taltarum’s suit. When therefore he makes default, Taltarum is enabled to recover the lands and dispose of them to the plaintiff for an estate in fee simple. Humfrey, the tenant in tail, would in his turn be entitled to recover against King, who had failed in making good the title of his donee. This of course was a mere fiction. It appears to have been assumed on both sides that if the case had not been complicated by the other entail, which according to the defendant had been created before the recovery by Taltarum (and the case was on this point decided in defendant’s favour), that that recovery would have been good, inasmuch as the ousted tenant in tail would have had his recompense against the vouchee; for this is the ground on which the Court base their judgment. This is the point which makes Taltarum’s Case so important a turning-point in the history of the law of estates tail. It established, not expressly, but by implication, that the Courts would allow a tenant in tail to ‘suffer a recovery,’ that is, to procure a plaintiff to bring a fictitious action against tenant in tail, or, more usually, against some person to whom tenant in tail had granted an estate for the express purpose of being made defendant in the proceedings. This grantee was technically called the ‘tenant to the praecipe or writ.’ A writ of right for the recovery of an estate in fee simple was thus brought collusively by the plaintiff against the tenant to the praecipe, who vouched to warranty the donor (the tenant in tail), and he in his turn vouched to warranty another person supposed to be his donor, usually the officer of the court. The necessary steps would then be taken to try the matter as between the plaintiff and the last vouchee; then followed the farce of ‘imparling,’ and the default of the second vouchee, the recovery of the fee by the plaintiff, the judgment that the vouchee should recompense the tenant in tail for his default, and the conveyance of the fee by the successful plaintiff to the ousted tenant in tail. (See form in Blackstone, vol. ii. appendix 5.) Thus wherever by proper words a tenancy in tail was created, as for instance where lands were given to B and the heirs of his body, remainder to C in fee, it was in the power of B, on his attaining full age, to ‘suffer a recovery;’ or, in other words, to turn his estate tail into an estate in fee simple, thereby causing the land to descend to heirs collateral as well as lineal, barring the reversion in fee to the lord, and defeating the expectations of all persons having estates limited to take effect subsequently to the estate tail. That the legislature should so long have abstained from substituting a simpler method, such as was at last applied in 1833, for a process so cumbersome and so expensive, is one of the most startling of the many marvellous instances in our system of law reforms delayed mainly through the indifference or ignorance which prevails so widely with respect to legal questions.
pectancy. An estate in expectancy, or, more accurately, a right of future enjoyment of lands, is distinguished from an estate in possession, or an estate of present enjoyment. The actual enjoyment or possession of lands is in the former case postponed until the lapse of a specified time, or the happening of some specified event. On the other hand, these estates differ from mere chances or possibilities of rights, inasmuch as they are distinct and definite interests known to the law, capable of alienation by the appropriate methods, and devolving at the death of the person entitled upon his representatives. Thus in the case of a gift of lands to A for life, and after his decease to B and his heirs, B has an estate in fee simple in the lands, postponed in point of possession or enjoyment till after the death of A, but yet a present interest which he can dispose of in the proper method, and which will descend to his heir. On the other hand, the expectation of C, eldest son of D tenant in fee simple, of succeeding to his father’s lands, is not an interest recognised by the law, it is merely the hope or chance of having certain rights at some future time. If C dies before his father, his eldest son succeeds, not as representing him, but as heir to D the grandfather.

At present we are only concerned with such interests of future enjoyment as belong to the class of freehold rights over land. These are of two kinds, reversions and remainders.

(1) Reversions.

Where a freeholder grants away some estate smaller than that which he has himself, he has, in the metaphorical language of the law, an interest left in him, which, though not immediately an interest of present possession or enjoyment, will become such so soon as the smaller preceding interest has expired. Thus, where a tenant in fee simple has created an estate in tail, for life, or for years, he has left in

1 See Pearce’s treatise on Contingent Remainders, p. 2. him a present estate, which will come into possession or enjoyment on the expiration or sooner determination of the estate tail, the estate for life, or the estate for years. The smaller estate thus granted is called the ‘particular’ estate.
‘A reversion,’ says Sir E. Coke, ‘is where the residue of the estate always doth continue in him that made the particular estate.’

It has already been observed, that between the reversioner and the tenant of the particular estate a tenure exists—the latter holds of the former. Hence, before the Statute 4 Anne, c. 16, the attornment of the tenant was necessary to complete the grant of the reversion; otherwise, the tenant would have had a new lord imposed upon him without his consent.

The proper mode of conveying or disposing of the reversion is by grant, that is, grant by deed, or writing on paper or parchment sealed and delivered. Suppose A has the reversion in fee simple expectant on an estate tail, or on an estate for life, or on an estate for years. He can by a simple deed of grant create any number of estates tail, or estates for life, or estates for years out of his reversionary interest, and dispose of them as he pleases. He can deal with the reversionary interest just as he can deal with an interest in possession, only he cannot give livery of seisin, for the simple reason that he has it not to give, inasmuch as he is not in actual possession of the lands. This however is subject to the exception that the reversioner is in one sense seised when the particular estate is only a lease for years. The lessee for years is, as has been said above, not seised of the lands, but only possessed of the term. Seisin, as has been seen, implies
(1) actual possession, (2) possession as of freehold. Where therefore there is a particular estate of leasehold tenure, the reversioner, if he can obtain the consent of the lessee to come on the land for the purpose, can pass his interest by feoffment,

1 Coke upon Littleton, 22 b.
2 See above, § 1.
3 See above, p. 193, n. 2.
accompanies by livery of seisin. In this case, however, he grants, not the reversion, but the freehold in possession.

When a reversion desires, not to grant his reversion to a third person, but to convey it to the person who already has the particular estate, he is said to release the reversion. This he may do by deed. Supposing therefore, in the case above put, A, tenant of the reversion in fee, should execute a deed releasing his interest to tenant in tail, tenant for life, or tenant for years, the reversion in fee would coalesce with the particular estate in tail, for life, or for years. This coalescing of a smaller estate with a larger is called merger, the rule being that where the same person becomes entitled to two estates, the one of which is to take effect in possession during the continuance or immediately on the determination of the other, the smaller one is merged or swallowed up in the larger. So in the above cases, each of the tenants in possession, tenant in tail, tenant for life, and tenant for years, becomes at once tenant in fee simple in possession. The same effect is produced by the surrender of the particular estate to the reversioner. The particular estate merges in the larger reversionary estate.

Thus, as the law became more refined, new modes of conveying lands from one person to another were introduced, destined, with some modifications to be hereafter noticed, to supersede in practice the old feoffment, fine, and recovery.

If A, tenant in fee simple, wished to convey the lands to B, he might make a lease to him of the lands in question, upon which B would enter, and was then at once capable of taking a release by deed of the reversion in fee. This was called conveyance by lease and release, and became in later times the usual mode of conveying lands. Its later history will be noticed hereafter.

A conveyance of the reversion might also be made to a

---

1 See the passage from Britton quoted above, § 1. The word ‘release’ is the proper technical expression for this class of conveyances.

2 See Littleton, sect. 459.

3 See Chapter VII. § 3.
CHAP. V. stranger. In this case it was formerly necessary that the tenant of the particular estate, whether in tail, for life, or for years, should attorn to the grantee of the reversion, in other words, acknowledge him as the person of whom the lands were held. The necessity for attornment was done away with by 4 Anne, c. 16, sects. 9, 10. Thus two new modes of conveying the immediate freehold were added, lease and release, and grant and attornment.

(2) Remainders (Vested and Contingent).

The other kind of future interests which can arise at common law in freeholds are called remainders. A remainder differs from a reversion in this, that while a reversion is an estate of future enjoyment not expressly created by, but resulting from, the alienation of a 'particular' estate, a remainder is created by express words at the same time as the particular estate, and is so limited as to come into enjoyment or possession so soon as the particular estate comes to an end. In Sir Edward Coke's words¹, a remainder is 'a remnant of an estate in lands or tenements, expectant on a particular estate created together with the same at one time.'

As has been seen, a tenure exists between the reversioner and the tenant of the particular estate. This is not the case as between the remainder-man (or person to whom the remainder is given), and the tenant of the particular estate.

In order that a freehold remainder may be effectually created at common law, it is necessary that the seisin or freehold possession should be vested in the grantee of the particular estate, or, if the particular estate be an estate for years, in the remainder-man, and that at the same time the remainder should pass to the person entitled after the donee of the particular estate. This was a consequence of the great importance attached to the preservation of notoriety as to the person entitled to the freehold. Hence it was that the doctrine arose that a freehold interest in possession must pass instantly from donor to donee, that, as it was sometimes expressed, it could not be for an instant in abeyance. The only mode of conveying such an interest was by feoffment with livery of seisin, or by the fictitious processes of fine or recovery. It was however possible for the tenant in fee simple, in making a grant, to divide the interest which passed from him among two or more persons, so that one should take immediately after the interest of the other came to an end. There must be no interval between the end of the first interest and the commencement of the second; the instant the first determines, the second begins. Thus, suppose A, tenant in fee simple, makes a feoffment accompanied by livery of seisin to B for his life, and after the termination of that estate, or (more shortly) with remainder to C and the heirs of his body, with remainder to D and his heirs, the gift would operate as expressed, and the various estates come into enjoyment, one after the other, upon the determination of the preceding estate in each case. The ultimate limitation in fee is of course liable to be barred or cut off by the tenant in tail suffering a recovery. On the other hand, A cannot, at common law, make a feoffment to B for life, to commence in point of enjoyment at any future period, for instance, the day after tomorrow, nor can he provide that the remainder limited to C shall take effect six months after the death of B. An estate in remainder must according to the rules of the common law, come into possession or enjoyment at once, as soon as the particular estate upon which it is limited comes to an end.

¹ Coke upon Littleton, 143 a.

It follows, from the very definition of a remainder above given, that so soon as the fee simple is parted with, the donor has given away all that he has to grant, and can make no ulterior disposition. A remainder limited to take effect after a fee simple estate is simply void. Nor is the case altered when, as has been pointed out above, the estate in fee simple is liable to be terminated by the happening of some specified event. For instance, if an estate be granted to $A$ and his heirs so long as he continues unmarried, this estate will come to an end upon $A$'s marriage; but the rule that a remainder cannot be limited after a fee simple would, at common law\(^1\), prevent the settlor from making any ulterior gift, such as 'and from and after the marriage of $A$ to $B$ and his heirs.' Nor again would the common law permit an estate to be granted to $A$ for life, provided that if $A$ should marry $B$, the estate should go to $C$. This would not be a remainder or grant of a remnant of an estate within Sir E. Coke's definition, but the creation of an estate in derogation of a previous estate, and this was not permissible at common law\(^2\). In like manner the established rule that the benefit of a condition can only be reserved in favour of the donor or his heirs, operated to prevent the creation of any ulterior estate, to take effect on the happening of any future event. Though a person may, on making a grant of lands, reserve to himself and his heirs a right of re-entry on the happening of any specified event, he cannot reserve this right in favour of a stranger. $A$ grants lands to $B$ and his heirs on condition of his rendering rent annually; upon non-payment, $A$ enters and defeats the estate of $B$. But such a condition and right of entry cannot be reserved in favour of $C$. Thus it appears that the only mode of creating rights of future enjoyment in freeholds at common

\(^1\) See Fearne on Contingent Remainders, 8th ed. p. 12. The employment of uses, both before and after the Statute of Uses, to create interests of this character, and the effects of the recent Statute 40 & 41 Vict. c. 33, will be explained hereafter. (See Chaps. VI. and VII.)

\(^2\) See Butler's note to Fearne's Contingent Remainders, p. 383; Sugden's note to Gilbert on Uses, p. 177. It would seem however that there would be no objection at common law to a grant to $A$ until marriage with $B$ and then to $C$. Here the estate would be an estate determinable upon the specified event, and in any case would not be more than a life estate, there being no words of inheritance in the grant, see above, p. 137, n. 1. Such a grant would therefore be a conditional limitation (see above, pp. 134, 135), and on the happening of the event the estate would terminate in accordance with the limitation, and this estate, being a particular estate, and not a fee simple, there is nothing to prevent the estate to $C$ taking effect by way of remainder. See Fearne, p. 13, and Butler's note, ibid.
law is by way of remainder—a remainder being confined within the limits of Sir E. Coke’s definition.

The doctrine of remainders at common law came in process of time to be subject to a further complication, which should be noticed here. Hitherto remainders have been treated as present or vested interests where the enjoyment is postponed till the lapse of a certain specified time or the happening of some specified event. A distinction subsequently arose between remainders where an estate of future enjoyment was given to a definite existing person upon an event certain to happen, and where an estate of future enjoyment was created in favour of a person not existing, or not ascertained, or was to come into effect upon an event which might or might not happen. In the former case the remainder is said to be vested, in the latter it is said to be contingent.

In the case of a vested remainder nothing interferes with the enjoyment of the remainder-man, except the fact that the property is in the hands of the tenant of the particular estate. All that has to happen, in order that the remainder-man may come into enjoyment of the property, is the termination of the particular estate. Of course it may be that the person entitled to the remainder may as a fact never come into the enjoyment of the property, as, for instance, where lands are given to A for life, remainder to B for life, and B dies before A, but this does not affect the fact that B’s interest, so long as it exists, is a vested remainder.

1 The history of contingent remainders is obscure. It seems from the case in the Liber Assisarum given below, that in one form they were recognised as early as the reign of Edward III. However, the passage from Littleton (sect. 720, etc.), and the cases in the Year Books referred to by Mr. Joshua Williams (Principles of Real Property, p. 278), show that their recognition was not firmly established till a later period. It seems however convenient to give a sketch of the general rules relating to contingent remainders in this place.

2 It is not the uncertainty of ever taking effect in possession that makes a remainder contingent; for to that, every remainder for life or in tail is and must be liable; as the remainder-man may die, or die without issue before the death of the tenant for life. The present capacity of taking effect in possession, if the possession were to become vacant, and not the certainty
On the other hand, in the case of a contingent remainder, something must happen besides the determination of the particular estate before the interest created can come into actual enjoyment. If the remainder be limited to a person unborn or not ascertained, as, for instance, if lands be given to A for life, remainder to the unborn son of B in tail, in order that the contingent remainder may take effect, B must have a son born, or at least begotten\(^1\), in the lifetime of A. So soon as this happens, the remainder vests in the son of B. In other words, the future interest, which before was a contingent, now becomes a vested remainder. So if lands are given to A, remainder to the heirs of B\(^2\), B must die in A's lifetime, for _nemo est haeres viventia_; and if B survives A for ever so short an interval, his heir will never take, otherwise there would be a period during which the freehold would be in abeyance\(^3\). So if lands are given to A and B jointly for life, remainder to the survivor in fee, so soon as one dies, the contingent remainder which the other had is turned into a vested remainder, which again by the operation of the doctrine of merger coalesces with the life estate\(^4\), and the survivor becomes entitled to an estate in fee simple in possession. So again, if lands be given to A till C returns from Rome, then to B and his heirs, this is a contingent remainder\(^5\), for the estate upon which the expectant interest is limited to take effect, is determinable on an event which may never happen. On the other hand, if the interest were expressed to take that the possession will become vacant before the estate limited in remainder determines, universally distinguishes a vested remainder from one that is contingent.\(^6\) (Fearn on Contingent Remainders, p. 316.)

1. See Williams on Real Property, p. 284, and Stat. 10 and 11 Will. III, c. 16.
2. This seems to have been the earliest form in which contingent remainders were recognised. See the case from 30 Lib. Ass. below.
3. This rule in the case of contingent remainders created after August 2, 1877 must be understood as subject to the alteration in the law effected by 40 & 41 Vict. c. 33. See below, Chap. VII.
4. As to ‘merger’ see above, p. 217.
effect after the death of $A$ or upon $C$'s return from Rome, whichever might first happen, the estate would be a vested remainder, for it is certain that $A$ will die.

The principles above laid down will suffice to explain the rule which prevails in the case of contingent remainders, that inasmuch as the freehold can never be in abeyance, 'every contingent remainder of an estate of freehold must have a particular estate of freehold to support it.' Thus not only must every contingent remainder of a freehold be ready to vest, that is to become a complete right either of present or of future enjoyment (an estate in possession or a vested remainder) so soon as the preceding estate comes to an end, but that preceding estate must itself, at common law, be an estate of freehold. Lands cannot, at common law, be given to $A$ for ten years, remainder to the unborn son of $B$.

The subjoined passage from Littleton shows that in his time the doctrine of contingent remainders was not firmly established. It cannot be said that in the above cases 'the remainder is in him to whom the remainder is entailed, before livery of seisin is made to him that has the freehold.' No doubt in the case of a gift to $B$, remainder to the heirs of $C$, the person who is the heir presumptive or apparent, that is who would be the heir if the ancestor were to die at once, has a chance, or possibility, or expectation of the right becoming his, but it is not such a right as the law regards as vested, that is as completely created—it is wanting in the main characteristic of a vested or completely created right, for there is no determinate person to take it.

Contingent remainders may be created in favour of unborn persons, provided only that the person who is to take the estate comes into existence before the preceding particular estate comes to an end. So soon as the designated person is born, the estate vests in him. Thus an estate might be given by way of remainder to an unborn person for life or in tail, subject only to the rule that no interest could be given to the unborn child of an unborn person. For instance, if an estate be given to A for life, remainder to his unborn son in tail, remainder to C in fee, the first remainder is contingent, that is, it does not become a completely vested interest, for the reason above given, till A has a son born. So soon as this happens the interest is no longer contingent, but vested or complete, and the son of A has a vested remainder in tail, an interest which is ready to come into possession or enjoyment so soon as A's life estate determines. On the other hand, C has an interest which is vested or complete from the moment of its creation.

\[1 \text{ See Williams on Real Property, p. 283.} \]

Now if, before A has a son born, his life estate determines by death, forfeiture or otherwise, or if he acquire the fee by taking a conveyance from C of his interest, in which case before the birth of a son his life estate would merge or become united to or lost in the fee simple, or if before the same event he convey his life interest to C, in all the above cases the contingent remainder would, as the law formerly stood, have been destroyed, and no after-born son of A would take any interest at all. This liability to be destroyed by the happening of any of the above events was the great characteristic of contingent remainders, and the ingenuity of conveyancers was exercised to prevent so inconvenient a result. A recent change in the law has removed the liability to destruction to which contingent remainders were subject by reason of the forfeiture, surrender, or merger of any preceding estate of freehold.

The same act renders contingent remainders alienable inter vivos. Formerly the chance or contingency was not considered an appropriate subject of alienation inter vivos, though

---

1 See Farn's Contingent Remainders, p. 502. This rule, which has long been firmly established, has taken the place of, and perhaps may be historically traced to, the somewhat unintelligible doctrine laid down by Sir E. Coke, that a possibility upon a possibility is never admitted by intention of law. See Williams on Real Property, p. 286.

2 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106. s. 8.

3 Sect. 6.
it fell within the rights capable of being disposed of by will. CHAP. V.

At the present day, if lands are given to A for life, remainder, if C be living at his decease, to B and his heirs, B may dispose of his contingent interest during the lives of A and C by alienation inter vivos, or by will 1, or, upon his decease intertestate, the contingent remainder will descend to his heir 2.

There is one rule of construction of great technicality, but at the same time of much practical importance, which should be noticed in connection with the doctrine of remainders. It has been seen that in a grant to A and his heirs, or to A and the heirs of his body, the words 'heirs,' 'heirs of his body,' or their equivalents, are words of limitation and not of purchase 3; they are merely descriptive of the estate taken by A, and do not express that any estate is conveyed to A's heir. The same rule applies although the words of the grant may appear to convey expressly an estate to the heirs by way of remainder. Thus, if a gift be made to A and after his decease to his heirs, or to A for life and after his decease to B for life (or to B and the heirs of his body), with an ultimate remainder to the heirs of A, the above rule operates to prevent the vesting of any estate in the heir directly by the gift; A (in the last case) has two estates, one for life in possession, the other in fee in remainder; if the intermediate estate of B be taken away, merger 4 takes place, and A becomes tenant in fee in possession. This doctrine is known by the name of the 'rule in Shelley's case' 5, and may be stated as follows:—Wherever there is a limitation to a man which if it stood alone would convey to him a 'particular' estate of freehold, followed by a limitation to his heirs or to the heirs of his body (or equivalent expressions) either immediately, or after the interposition of one or more other particular estates, the apparent gift to the heirs or

1 Fearne, Contingent Remainders, 266, note. 7 Will. IV and 1 Vict. c. 26. s. 3.
2 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 106. s. 1.
3 See above, pp. 134, 137.
4 See above, p. 217.
5 See Williams on Real Property, p. 270.

Q heirs of the body is to be construed as a limitation of the estate of the ancestor, and not as a gift to his heir. The conception of a ‘remainder’ is probably peculiar to English law, and is closely connected with the notions of estate and tenure. The tenant of lands has not the full property, but only an estate or interest of greater or less extent or duration. An estate in fee simple is considered as an aggregate out of which any number of smaller estates may be derived or carved; so long as the fee simple itself is not parted with, it is retained as a present interest or right, though the enjoyment or possession of it is postponed. So the interests which are parted with are regarded as present rights postponed in point of enjoyment. Roman law did not admit of the simultaneous existence in different persons of separate rights of future and present enjoyment over the same subject-matter, except perhaps in the case of dominium, and the so-called jus in re aliena (usufructus emphytensis, etc.).
Where these rights existed, the interest of the dominus was closely analogous to an English reversion. In French law, as it stood before the Code Napoleon, and in the systems derived from it (e.g. the law of Lower Canada), it is possible to create future interests by way of substitution. A thing may be given inter vivos or by will to A, subject to a condition that he should on the happening of a specified event, as for instance at his own decease, hand it over to B. In this case a substitution is created in favour of B. A is regarded as the complete proprietor, subject only to the charge of handing over the thing to B and to all that is involved in it, for instance, he may not alienate, charge, or destroy the thing which is the subject of the substitution. B, on the other hand, has no present right, he has merely the hope or expectation of becoming the proprietor of the thing if he survives
A. If he die, living A, nothing passes to his heirs; but if he survives A, he becomes upon A’s death full proprietor. The 1 See Littleton, sect. 719, Coke’s Commentary, ad loc., and Williams on Real Property, pp. 270–272.

doctrine of substitutions formed a large and important chapter in the early French law, but were wholly abolished by the Code Napoleon, Article 896.\footnote{1}

Brooke's Abridgment\footnote{2}, Done and Remainder, \S\ 2.

Translation.

30 Libra Assisarum, p. 47. H. was seised of tenements in Winchester devisable by will by custom, where there is also a custom that he who is seised by devise cannot make alienation by warranty or otherwise which shall be a bar to the remainderman, or reversioner. H. devised to Alice his wife for term of life, remainderer to Thomas his son for term of life, so that the said Thomas should make no gift or alienation so as to bar the remainderer to the nearer heirs of the blood of the children propinquioribus haeredibus de sanguine puerorum of the said H. after the death of the said Thomas. And H. had also issue Maud (who had issue Isabel), and Edmund elder brother of Thomas. And then H. the deviser died, and afterwards E. the elder son died without issue. Alice the mother entered by the devise and died seised, and then Thomas entered and aliened in fee with warranty to the tenant in the assize, and Maud died. And Isabel her daughter, plaintiff in the assize, made claim, and took the door of the messuage now in demand into her hands by the hasp. And Thomas afterwards died without issue, and Isabel entered upon the assize, and he ousted her, and she brings the assize, and it is said that those who are the heirs of H. shall not have the remainder by force of the words propinquioribus haeredi-

\footnote{1} See some excellent observations on the English conception of an 'estate' and its consequences in Markby's Elements of Law, p. 154; and see Pothier, Traité des Substitutions, art. 1-6.

\footnote{2} Brooke's Abridgment is a compilation and arrangement of the cases reported in the Year Books and early Reports, and was published in the year 1568; Reeves, iii. 814.

\footnote{3} A volume of Reports of the reign of Edward III, numbered according to the year of the reign.

\footnote{4} See above, p. 47.

\footnote{5} I. e. the defendant. The case turns on whether upon the proper construction of the devise the remainder in fee vests in Thomas, who would then have conveyed it to the defendant, or in Isabel.

\footnote{6} As to 'continual claim' and its effect in preserving to the person disseised the right of actual entry, see Littleton, lib. iii. c. 7. s. 414.
CHAP. V. *bus de sanguine puonorum*¹, for it is not limited to his heirs, but to the next in blood of his children, so that his children themselves shall not have the land by the remainder, but the children of the children.

(Wilby.) A man leased to A for term of life, remainder to his next of blood, and had issue two sons; the elder has issue and dies, tenant for life dies, the younger brother shall have the land and not the issue of the elder brother, for the younger brother is nearer of blood to his father the devisor than is the son of the elder son, for the one is his own son, and the other is only the son of his son, and yet the son of his elder son is his heir, but not his next of blood.

(Seaton.) If H. had had many sons and daughters who had issue and died, the remainder vests in the heir of each of the children of H., since he is proximus etc. de sanguine puonorum, which extends to the heirs of all the children of H.; but if the daughter of H. had issue when the tenant for life died, and the son of H. had no issue at that time, the issue of the daughter of H. shall have the remainder of the whole; and notwithstanding the son of H. should have issue afterwards, that issue should have nothing, for it was vested in the other before, and he in whom the remainder vests when it falls retains it.⁵ It is otherwise in the case of a descent, as where there is a descent to a daughter, and afterwards a son is born, the son ousts the daughter. With a remainder it is different.

(Finchaden.) If land be leased for term of life, remainder to the right heirs of J. and N.⁴, and then J. have issue and die, and then tenant for life dies, and the heir of J. enter, and then N. die, the heir of N. shall have nothing, because he was not the heir when the remainder fell.⁴

(Fisher.) If there be brother and sister, and the land be leased for term of life, remainder to the right heirs of the brother, and he die, and the tenant for life dies, the sister enters, and then the wife of the brother is delivered of a son begotten by the brother in his lifetime, the son shall not have the land, but the sister, who is aunt to him, shall retain it, because the land was

¹ And therefore that the defendant, alinee of Thomas, had no title, although Thomas was the heir of the heir of H.
² See above, p. 222.
³ It will be observed that this is a contingent remainder. Nemo est heredes viventes. These words are sufficient to convey in the case in the text an estate in fee to the heir of J.
⁴ See above, p. 222.
vested in her before, since where a remainder or any other purchasement vests in any person it shall continue in such person. 1

And then the assize was awarded. And so observe that by this award the daughter of the daughter, plaintiff in the assize, shall have the remainder, and not the alienee of T., since the remainder never vested in T. as heir of E., who was heir of H. the deviser; for it was said that by those words—to the next in blood of his children—that the child himself should take nothing, but another of the blood of the same child whichever be nearer, and the plaintiff recovered by the award: quod nota.

LITTLETON’S TENURES, lib. iii. c. 13, sect. 720. Item jeo ay oye dit, que en temps le Roy Richard le second, il y fuist un Justice de le Comen Baneke, demurrant en Kent, appelle Rykhill, qui avoit issue divers fitz, et son entent fuist, que son eisne fitz averoit certeyn terres et tenementes a luy, et a les heires de son corps engendres, et pur defaute fissue, le remeyndre a le second fitz, etc., et issint a le tierce fitz, etc., et pur cee qu’il voil que nul de ses fitz alieneroit ou ferroit garrantie pur barrer ou leder les autres que eux serreront en le remeyndre, etc., il fist faire tiel endenture a tiel effecte, scil. que les terres et tenementes furent dones a son eisne fitz sur tiel condicion, que si leisse fitz alienast en fee, ou en fee taille, etc., ou si ascun de ses fitz alienast, etc., que adonques leur estate cessa et serroit voyde, et que adonques mesmes les terres et tenementes immediate remeyndront a le second fitz, et a les heires de son corps engendres etc., sur mesma la con-dicion, scil. que si le il fitz alienast etc., que adonques son estate cessera, et que adonques mesmes les terres et tenementes immediat remeyndront al tierce fitz et a les heires des son corps engendres, et sic ultra, le remeyndre as autres de ses fitz, et lyveré de seisin fuist fait accordant.

Sect. 721. Mais il semble per reason que toutes tielx rem-eyndres en la fourne avautdit faites sont voides et de nul value, et cee pur trois causes. Une cause est, pur cee que chescun remeyndre que commence par un fait, il coviert que le remeyndre soit en luy a qui le remeyndre est taillé per force de mesme le faits quant 2 le lyveré de seisin est fait a luy qui avera le frank-tenement, car en tiel case la nessance et le estre de le remeyndre est per le lyveré de seisin a celuy qui avera le franktenement, et

1 See above, p. 221, note 2.
2 A later reading generally adopted is ‘avant.’ See Sir E. Coke’s translation.
Sect. 722. La seconde cause est, si le premier fitz alienast les robe en fee, donques est le franktenement et le fee simple en aliené, et en nul autre, et si le donour avoit ascun reversion, par tiel alienacion, la revercion est discontinue; donques coment per ascun reason poct estre, que tiel remainder commenceva son estre et sa possession immediate apres tiel alienacion fait a un estraunge, qui ad per mesme alienacion franktenement, et fee simple? Et aussi si tiel remainder serroit bon, donques poctu il entrer sur aliené, lou il navoit ascun manere de droit avant alienacion, que serroit inconvenient.

Sect. 723. La tierce cause est, quant la condition est tiel, que si leisme fitz alienast, etc., que son estate cesseria ou serroit voyde, etc., donques apres tiel alienacion, etc. poct le donour entrer per force de tiel condition etc., comme il semble, et isint le donour et ses heires en tiel cas doient plus tost aver la terre que le second fitz, qui navoit ascun droit devant tiel alienacion, etc.; et isint il semble que tielz remainderes en le cas avautdiz sont voydes.

SIR E. COKU'S TRANSLATION.

Sect. 720. Also, I have heard say, that in the time of King Richard the Second there was a justice of the Common Place 1 dwelling in Kent, called Richel, who had issue divers sons, and his intent was, that his eldest son should have certain lands and tenements to him, and to the heirs of his body begotten; and for default of issue, the remainder to the second son, and so to the third son: and because he would that none of his sons should alien or make warranty to bar or hurt the others that should be in the remainder, he causeth an indenture to be made to this effect, viz. that the lands and tenements were given to his eldest son upon such condition, that if the eldest son alien in fee, or in fee tail, or if any of his sons alien, that then their estate should cease and be void, and that then the same lands and tenements immediately should remain to his second son and to the heirs of his body begotten, et sic ultra, the remainder to his other sons, and livery of seisin was made accordingly.

1 Or Common Pleas.
Sect. 721. But it seemeth by reason that all such remainders in the form aforesaid are void and of no value, and that for three causes. One cause is, for that every remainder which beginneth by a deed it behoveth that the remainder be in him to whom the remainder is entailed by force of the same deed, before the livery of seisin is made to him that shall have the freehold; for in such case the growing and the being of the remainder is by the livery of seisin to him that shall have the freehold, and such remainder was not to the second son at the time of the livery of seisin in the case aforesaid.

Sect. 722. The second cause is, if the first son alien the tenements in fee, then is the freehold and the fee simple in the alienee, and in none other; and if the donor had any reversion, by such alienation the reversion is discontinued; then how by any reason may it be that such remainder shall commence his being and his growing immediately after such alienation made to a stranger, that hath by the same alienation a freehold and fee simple? And also if such remainder should be good, then might he enter upon the alienee, where he had no manner of right before the alienation, which should be inconvenient.

Sect. 723. The third cause is, when the condition is such, that if the elder son alien, that his estate shall cease or be void, then after such alienation may the donor enter by force of such condition, as it seemeth; and so the donor or his heirs in such case ought sooner to have the land than the second son, that had not any right before such alienation; and so it seemeth that such remainders in the case aforesaid are void.

Another class of rights which attained greater precision during the interval under consideration, and assumed the characteristics which they have possessed ever since, are those

1 This however is contrary to the authority of the case given above. According to this doctrine, no contingent remainder, such as is created by a grant to A for life, remainder to the heir of B, could be valid.

2 It is an inflexible rule of common law that the benefit of a condition can only be reserved in favour of a donor or his heirs. A cannot, in a lease to B, impose a condition that on non-payment of rent C may enter. See above, p. 220.
CHAP. V. which are enjoyed by two or more persons who are simultaneously entitled to rights of property over the same piece of land. From the earliest times it must have been common for two or more persons to have undivided interests of some kind in land. By the time of Littleton three kinds of undivided ownership had come to be distinguished as having different attributes. The persons entitled are called joint tenants, tenants in common, coparceners. The main characteristics of this class of rights will sufficiently appear from the subjoined extracts. The point of resemblance between the three kinds is that the co-owners have no separate estate or interest in any distinct portion of the land over which they have simultaneously rights of property, they are each interested, according to the extent of their share, in every part of the whole land and its proceeds.

LITTLETON’s Tenures, lib. iii. c. 3. s. 277. Joint tenants are as if a man be seised of certain lands or tenements, and infeoffeth two, three, four, or more, to have and to hold to them for term of their lives, or for term of another’s life, by force of which feoffment or lease they are seised; these are joint tenants.

Sect. 280. And it is to be understood, that the nature of joint tenancy is, that he which surviveth shall have only the entire tenancy according to such estate as he hath, if the jointure be

1 In Bracton the general term ‘participes’ is applied to such persons under whatever title they hold (66. 428; Reeves, i. p. 447). It was said of such a tenant ‘totum tenet et nihil tenet, scilicet totum in communi et nihil separation per se.’ In the Statute 24 Edward I, stat. 1, certain provisions are made ‘de conjunctim foedatis,’ providing for the case where a tenant in an assise of novel disseisin pleaded that another was seised jointly with him.

2 The extracts from Littleton’s text given above are sufficient as specimens of the language in which he wrote. The following extracts are from the translation adopted by Sir E. Coke.

3 Joint tenants differ from parencers or coparceners in the mode in which their interest is created. Joint tenancy must commence in consequence of alienation inter vivos or by will, an estate in coparcenary arises by devolution ab intestato to daughters, sisters, etc., or sons in gavelkind tenure. All the joint tenants must owe their estate to the same title, that is, the feoffment or other instrument of alienation must operate to convey a co-extensive interest, at the same time, to all the joint tenants. See Blackstone, ii. 180.
continued. As if three joint tenants be in fee simple, and the one hath issue and dieth, yet they which survive shall have the whole tenements, and the issue shall have nothing. And if the second joint tenant hath issue and dieth, yet the third which surviveth shall have the whole tenements to him and to his heirs for ever. But otherwise it is of parceners; for if three parceners be, and before any partition made the one hath issue and dieth, that which to him belongeth shall descend to his issue. And if such parcener die without issue, that which belongs to her shall descend to her co-heirs, so as they shall have this by descent, and not by survivor as joint tenants shall have.

Sect. 281. And as the survivor holds place between joint tenants, in the same manner it holdeth place between them which have joint estate or possession with another of a chattel real or personal. As if a lease of lands or tenements be made to many for term of years, he which survives of the lessors shall have the tenements to him only during the term by force of the same lease. And if a horse or any other chattel personal be given to many, he which surviveth shall have the horse only.

Sect. 282. In the same manner it is of debts and duties, for if an obligation be made to many for one debt, he which surviveth shall have the whole debt or duty. And so is it of other covenants and contracts.

Sect. 283. Also there may be some joint tenants which may have a joint estate, and be joint tenants for term of their lives, and yet have several inheritances. As if lands be given to two men and to the heirs of their two bodies begotten, in this case the donees have a joint estate for term of their two lives, and yet they have several inheritances: for if one of the donees hath issue and dieth, the other which surviveth shall have the whole by the survivor for term of his life, and if he which surviveth hath also issue and dieth, then the issue of the one shall have the one moiety, and the issue of the other shall have the other moiety of the land, and they shall hold the land between them in common, and they are not joint tenants, but are tenants in common.

---

1 This is the essential characteristic of joint tenancy, distinguishing it both from coparcenary and from tenancy in common.
2 There is and has always been an exception in the case of property jointly owned for purposes of trade: the maxim being, 'Jus accrescendi inter mercatores locum non habet.'
Sect. 287. Also if there be two joint tenants of land in fee simple within a borough where lands and tenements are devisable by testament, and if the one of the said two joint tenants deviseth that which to him belongeth by his testament, and dieth, this devise is void. And the cause is, for that no devise can take effect till after the death of the devisor, and by his death all the land presently cometh by the law to his companion which surviveth, by the survivor, the which he doth not claim, nor hath anything in the land by the devisor, but in his own right by the survivor according to the course of law, and for this cause such devise is void. But otherwise it is of parceners seised of tenements devisable in like case of devise.

Sect. 288. Also it is commonly said that every joint tenant is seised of the land which he holdeth jointly per my et per tout; and this is as much as to say as he is seised by every parcel and by the whole, and this is true, for in every parcel and by every parcel and by all the lands and tenements he is jointly seised with his companion.

Sect. 290. Also, joint tenants (if they will) may make partition between them, and the partition is good enough, but they shall not be compelled to do this by law, but if they will make partition of their own will and agreement, the partition shall stand in force.

Sect. 291. Also if a joint estate be made of land to a husband and wife and to a third person, in this case the husband and wife have in law in their right but a moiety, and the third person shall have as much as the husband and wife, viz. the other

---

1 A joint tenant, though he can make an effectual alienation inter vivos, cannot do so by will. For the effect of alienation by a joint tenant during his life see sect. 292, below.

2 And yet, as Sir Edward Coke points out in his commentary on this passage, one of two joint tenants cannot dispose by feoffment, devise, or otherwise, of more than a moiety of the lands; nor is the estate of a joint tenant affected by the escheat or forfeiture of the interest of his co-tenant.

3 By a deed of partition. In this point joint tenants differ from coparceners, who were compellable to make partition by a proceeding called a writ of partition (Littleton, sect. 247). By the statutes 31 Henry VIII, c. 1; 32 Henry VIII, c. 32 this proceeding was made available for joint tenants. In later times the old writ of partition was in practice superseded by the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery enforcing partition amongst joint tenants, upon a bill for the purpose being filed by one of them, and the old writ was finally abolished by Statute 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 27, s. 36.
moiety. And the cause is for that the husband and wife are but Chap. V. one person in law. . . .

Chap. iv. sect. 292. Tenants in common are they which have lands or tenements in fee simple, fee tail, or for term of life, and they have such lands or tenements by several titles, and not by a joint title, and none of them know of this his several, but they ought by the law to occupy these lands or tenements in common, and pro indiviso to take the profits in common¹. And because they come to such lands or tenements by several titles and not by one joint title, and their occupation and possession shall be by law between them in common, they are called tenants in common. As if a man infeoff two joint tenants in fee, and the one of them alien that which to him belongeth to another in fee, now the alienee and the other joint tenant are tenants in common, because they are in such tenements by several titles, for the alienee cometh to the moiety by the feoffment of one of the joint tenants, and the other joint tenant hath the other moiety by force of the first feoffment made to him and to his companion. And so they are in by several titles, that is to say by several feoffments.

Sect. 296. But if lands be given to two men, and to the heirs of their two bodies begotten, the donees have a joint estate for term of their lives; and if each of them hath issue and die, their issue shall hold in common. But if lands be given to two abbots, as to the abbot of Westminster and to the abbot of St. Albans, to have and to hold to them and to their successors, in this case they have presently at the beginning an estate in common and not a joint estate. And the reason is, for that every abbot or other sovereign of a house of religion, before that he was made abbot or sovereign, was but as a dead person in law, and when he is made abbot he is as a man personable in law, only to purchase and have lands or tenements or other things to the use of his house, and not to his own proper use as another secular man may, and therefore at the beginning of their purchase they are tenants in common; and if one of them die, the abbot which surviveth shall not have the whole by survivor, but the successor of the abbot which ¹ Thus if lands are given to two to hold as tenants in common and one dies, his heir holds in common with the other. So one tenant in common may have a different estate from another—one may have the estate for years, another in fee, another for life, etc. The only essential characteristic is that the land itself should not be divided.

CHAP. V. is dead shall hold the moiety in common with the abbot that § 4. surviveth.

Sect. 298. Also if lands be given to two to have and to hold, sell, the one moiety to the one and to his heirs, and the other moiety to the other and to his heirs, they are tenants in common.

Sect. 299. Also if a man seised of certain lands infeoff another of the moiety of the same land without any speech of assignment or limitation of the same moiety in severalty at the time of the feoffment, then the feoffee and feoffor shall hold their parts of the land in common.

Lib. iii. c. i. sect. 241. Parceners are of two sorts, to wit, parceners according to the course of the common law, and parceners according to the custom. Parceners after the course of the common law are where a man or woman seised of certain lands or tenements in fee simple or in tail hath no issue but daughters and dieth, and the tenements descend to the issues, and the daughters enter into the lands or tenements so descended to them, then they are called parceners, and be but one heir to their ancestor. And they are called parceners because by the writ which is called breve de participazione facienda the law will constrain them that partition shall be made among them. And if there be two daughters to whom the land descendent, then they be called two parceners, and if there be three daughters they be called three parceners, and four daughters four parceners, and so forth.

Sect. 254. And note that none are called parceners by the common law but females or the heirs of females which come to \[1\] Whether any particular gift creates a joint tenancy or a tenancy in common is a question of construction. The general rule at common law was in favour of a joint tenancy, as is seen from the first instance in sect. 256. It might have been expected that that gift would have simply created a tenancy in common in fee simple. In order to create a tenancy in common it is necessary that there should be words which either expressly or by necessary implication mean that the inheritances are to be several; as in the text, 'to the heirs of their seco bodies begotten.' A gift however in these terms to a man and a woman capable of marrying each other would create a joint tenancy. In the later period of the law the rule has been different, and the inclination of the Court of Chancery was to construe limitations as much as possible in favour of tenancy in common.

\[2\] See above, p. 234, n. 3.
lands or tenements by descent; for if sisters purchase lands or tenements, of this they are called joint tenants and not parceners.

§ 5 (1).

Sect. 265. Parceners by the custom are where a man seised in fee simple or in fee tail of lands or tenements which are of the tenure called gavelkind within the county of Kent hath issue divers sons and die, such lands or tenements shall descend to all the sons by the custom, and they shall equally inherit and make partition by the custom, as females shall do, and a writ of partition lieth in this case as between females. But it behoveth in the declaration to make mention of the custom¹. Also such custom is in other places of England, and also such custom is in North Wales.

§ 5. Creditors’ Rights.

No branch of the law is of greater practical importance than that which relates to the rights which creditors gradually acquired of having recourse to the land of their debtors for the payment of their debts. In the first place, the creditor might acquire rights over the debtor’s land in consequence of a judicial proceeding either in the ordinary courts of common law, or under the extraordinary jurisdictions created by the Statute of Merchants, 13 Edward I, stat. 3, and the Statutum de Stapulis, 27 Edward III, stat. 2. c. 9. Secondly, a debtor might, without the intervention of any judicial proceedings, give the creditor the security of his land for a debt.

(1) Remedies by Legal Process.

After obtaining a judgment in his favour in an action at common law, the creditor was enabled by one of the provisions of the Statute of Westminster II (13 Edward I, c. 18) to choose whether to have execution upon the goods of the debtor by the writ which is still called the writ of fieri facias, or to have a writ commanding the sheriff to deliver to him all the chattels of the debtor saving only his oxen and beasts

¹ That is, in pleading it must be stated that the land is of the custom of gavelkind.
CHAP. V. of his plough, and [1] the one half of his land, until the debt be levied upon a reasonable price or extent.' This power of the creditor to seize and sell half the debtor's land is now [2] extended to the whole. The writ by which this is effected has ever since the Statute of Westminster II been called the writ of elegit.

The Statutes Merchant and Staple [3] were designed to give creditors who were merchants a speedier and more effectual mode of proceeding to recover debts than was afforded by the common law. The merchant creditor was empowered to summon his debtor before the 'Mayor of London or before some chief warden of a city or of another good town where the king shall appoint,' and obtain from him an acknowledgment or recognizance of the debt and of the day at which it would become due. This acknowledgment was then formally drawn up, and if the debt was not paid it might be enforced against the person and property of the debtor. As to the debtor's lands, the merchant shall have such seisin of the lands and tenements delivered unto him or his assigns that he may maintain a writ of novel disseisin if he be put out, and of redisseisin also as of freehold, to hold to him and his assigns until the debt be paid [4].

It should be observed that these remedies by elegit and statute merchant bound the lands from the date of the judgment in the former case, and of the recognizance in the latter.

[1] The remedy by elegit against the goods of the debtor after having long been disused was revived in 1880 in consequence of the discovery that it afforded a more ample protection to the creditor in the case of the bankruptcy of the debtor. By the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 the writ of elegit is no longer to affect goods, and the words of the Statute of Westminster II quoted in the text 'all' to 'and' are repealed (46 and 47 Vict. c. 52, s. 169).
[2] 1 and 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 11.
[4] 13 Edward I, stat. 3. The jurisdiction given by 27 Edward III, stat. 2, is to be exercised by the Mayor and Constables of the Staple. See for the places where the Staple is to be kept, ib. c. 1.
The creditor might pursue his remedy against the lands although they had come to the hands of the heir of the debtor, or of a purchaser. Thus by the above provision a new kind of interest in lands was in effect created, and accordingly we read of tenancy by statute merchant, statute staple, and elegit 1.

The interest of such a tenant devolved at his decease not upon his heir but upon his executors or administrators, and so far partook of the nature of personalty. On the other hand, the estate had the characteristic of freehold that it had no fixed period of termination, and that the appropriate remedy was the assize of novel disseisin 2.

Besides the remedies available to the creditor against the debtor himself, the creditor might also in some cases take proceedings against the heir to whom the debtor’s lands had descended. It appears that in early times the heir was bound to satisfy the debts of his ancestor out of the lands which descended to him, so far as the personalty was not sufficient for the purpose 3. By the time of Edward I the liability of the heir for the debts of his ancestor seems to have been confined, except as regards debts due to the Crown, to those secured by deed (called specialty debts) in which the heir was expressly named 4. For such debts an action at law has always been maintainable by the creditor against the heir. The liability of the heir in this respect was by a later statute extended to the devisee of the debtor 5. But it was not till 1807 that any mode was provided by which creditors could

1 See Coke upon Littleton, 289 b.
2 See above, Chap. II. § 9.
3 Glanville, lib. vii. c. 8: 'Si vero non sufficient res defuncti ad debita persolvenda, tune quidem haeres ipse defectum ipsum de suo tenetur adimpleere; ha dico si habuerit actatem haeres ipse.' See also Bracton, 61 b.
4 See Britton, 64 b: 'For we will that none be bound to pay the debt of his ancestor, whose heir he is, to any other but to us, unless he be thereto especially bound by the deed of his ancestor.'
5 3 and 4 William and Mary, c. 14. s. 2, repealed by 11 Geo. IV and 1 Will. IV, c. 47, which gives a more extended remedy against the devisee. As to a devise, see Chap. VIII.
CHAP. V. realise out of the lands of the debtor in the hands of the heir or devisee their debts which were not secured by deed binding the heir or devisee. By 47 Geo. III, c. 74, the fee simple estates of deceased traders were rendered liable to the payment of all debts, 'as well debts due on simple contract as on specialty;' and in 1833 (3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 104) the same rule was applied to the estates of all deceased persons, reserving however a priority to specialty creditors. This priority was abolished by 32 and 33 Vict. c. 46. The mode in which effect is given to the provisions of these statutes is by having the real estate of the deceased administered by the Chancery Division of the High Court in a suit instituted by a creditor, and the proceeds applied to the payment, first of debts, and then of legacies.

(2) Mortgages.

The second class of creditors' rights above noticed exist when, without the intervention of any legal process, the debtor has voluntarily given his land as security for the debt.

This practice is very ancient. Pledges of land are often mentioned in Domesday. In the time of Glanvill pledges of land were of two kinds, vivum vadium and mortuum vadium. Where a vivum vadium was created, the land was conveyed to the creditor to be held by him for a certain time, during which the rents and profits went towards the discharge of the debt. In a mortuum vadium there was no such arrangement as to the profits. The latter class of security was looked on as a species of usury, and, though not absolutely prohibited, rendered the creditor liable to the penalties of usury. It appears however that upon payment of the debt the debtor might recover the land just as in the case of a pledge of a personal chattel. In the time of Littleton a mortgage

1 See Williams on Real Property, pp. 80–85.
2 'Quandoque res immobiles (ponuntur in vadium) ut terrae et tenementa et redditus... Item quandoque invadiatur res aliqua in mortuo vadio quanhad become a species of estate upon condition. The land was conveyed, usually by feoffment, by the debtor to the creditor, subject to the condition that on repayment of the loan by a certain day the feoffor (the debtor) might re-enter. On the failure of the feoffor to perform the condition, the law refused to regard the fact that the real nature and intent of the transaction was that the land should be held by the feoffee merely as a security for a debt, and insisted on the enforcing of the rules relating to estates upon condition in all their strictness, holding that the estate was thereupon vested absolutely in the feoffee.

In later times, when the jurisdiction of the Chancellor was firmly established, the rights and duties of mortgagor and mortgagee recognised by Equity became wholly different from those recognised by Law. In form the transaction is still at the present day a conveyance of the lands, subject to a condition for re-entry, or more commonly to an agreement for reconveyance by the mortgagee to the mortgagor.

MORTGAGES.

§ 5 (2).

\[\text{doque non. Mortuam vadium dicitur illud cuius fructus vel redditus interim percepit in nullo se acquietant. ... Cum vero res immobiles ponitur \textit{in vadium} ita quod inde facta fueritaisal ipsi creditori, et ad terminum, aut sua convenit inter credito et debito quod exitus et redditus interim se acquietent, aut sic quod in nullo se acquietent. Prima convenio justa est et tenet. Secunda justa est et in honesta, quae dicitur mortuum vadium, sed per curiam dominii regis non prohibetur fieri, et tamen repetit cun pro specie ususae. Unde si quis in talis vadio decesserit, et post mortem ejus hoc fuerit probatum, de rebus eis non alter disponet quam de rebus usurarii. ... Notandum tamen quod ex quo aliquis solvere id quod debuit, vel solvere se obtulit competenter, si creditor ulterius vadium penes se maliciose detinisset, debitor ipse se inde curiae conquerens tale breve habebit: Rex vicecomitii saltem. \textit{Praceipe N. quod just et sine dilatation reddat R. totam terram vel terram illam in illa villa quam ei invadiavit pro centum marcis ad terminum qui praeteritut dicet, et denarios suos idem recipiat, vel quam inde acquei- tavit ut dicit, et nisi fecerit summone eum per bonos,} etc. \textit{Glanville, lib. x. cc. 6, 8, 9;}}\]

\[\text{and in xiii. 36, an account is given of the \textit{\textquoteleft recognition\textquoteright} to ascertain whether land in dispute was held \textquoteleft ut de seado, an ut de vadio.}}\]

\[\text{1 \textquoteleft Equity\textquoteright means the rules acted on by the Court of Chancery before Nov. 1, 1875, in so far as such rules differed from the rules acted on in the Courts of Common Law. When on that date all the Courts were amalgamated, the distinction between Equity and Law in the former sense of the terms came to an end, and the rules of Equity whenever they come into conflict with rules of Law are paramount and are administered alike by all Courts.} \]
CHAP. V. On payment of the debt on a certain day, and to a proviso that, until default in payment of the debt, the mortgagor is to remain in possession. So far as the legal estate, or interest at common law, is concerned, the ordinary rules governing conveyances of land apply; no notice is taken of the object of the transaction; the mortgagor, who remains in possession, is considered to have an interest in the nature of a term until default made in the payment of the debt; after default, the whole legal property in the land passes irrevocably to the mortgagee, with all its incidents. For instance, a mortgagor, after default in payment of the mortgage debt, cannot, except under the special powers created by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act 1881, make a valid lease of the lands without the concurrence of the mortgagee. In Equity, however, the real nature of the transaction is regarded, and even after default is made, notwithstanding the terms of the instrument creating the mortgage, the mortgagee will be made to reconvey the land to the mortgagor on payment of debt, interest, and costs. This right which remains in the mortgagor is called his equity of redemption (right to redeem), and is in fact the ownership of the land subject to the mortgage debt.

LITTLETON'S TENURES, lib. iii. c. 5. sect. 332. (Of Estates upon Condition.) Item, if a feoffment be made upon such condition that if the feoffor pay to the feoffee at a certain day forty pounds of money, that then the feoffor may re-enter; in this case the feoffee is called tenant in mortgage, which is as much to say in French as mort gage, and in Latin mortuum vadium. And it seemeth that the cause why it is called mortgage is, for that it is doubtful whether the feoffor will pay at the day limited such sum or not: and if he doth not pay, then the land which is put in pledge upon condition for the payment of the money is taken from

1 The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, provides a statutory form of mortgage in which these conditions are included by implication (44 and 45 Vict. c. 41. s. 26, and Third Schedule).
2 By this Act, 44 and 45 Vict. c. 41 s. 18 a mortgagor may now without the concurrence of the mortgagee make valid agricultural and mining leases subject to the conditions therein specified.
3 See further as to mortgages, Williams on Real Property, part iv. chap. ii.
him for ever, and so dead to him upon condition. And if he doth pay the money, then the pledge is dead as to the tenant.

Sect. 337. Also as a man may make a feoffment in fee in mortgage, so a man may make a gift in tail in mortgage, and a lease for term of life, or for term of years in mortgage. And all such tenants are called tenants in mortgage according to the estates which they have in the land.

Sect. 339. Also if a feoffment be made upon condition that if the feoffor pay a certain sum of money to the feoffee, then it shall be lawful to the feoffor and his heirs to enter; in this case if the feoffor die before the payment made, and the heir will tender to the feoffee the money, such tender is void, because the time within which this ought to be done is past. For when the condition is, that if the feoffor pay the money to the feoffee, this is as much to say as if the feoffor during his life pay the money to the feoffee; and when the feoffor dieth then the time of the tender is past. But otherwise it is where a day of payment is limited, and the feoffor die before the day, then may the heir tender the money as is aforesaid, for that the time of the tender was not past by the death of the feoffor. Also it seemeth that in such case, where the feoffor dieth before the day of payment, if the executors of the feoffee tender the money to the feoffee at the day of payment, this tender is good enough; and if the feoffee refuse it, the heirs of the feoffor may enter. And the reason is for that the executors represent the person of their testator.

Sect. 339. Also if the feoffee in mortgage before the day of payment which should be made to him makes his executors and die, and his heir entereth into the land as he ought, it seemeth in this case that the feoffor ought to pay the money at the day appointed to the executors, and not to the heir of the feoffee, because the money at the beginning trencheth to the feoffee in manner as a duty, and it shall be intended that the estate was made by reason of the lending of the money by the feoffee, or for some other duty; and therefore the payment shall not be made to the heir as it seemeth, but the words of the condition may be such as the payment shall be made to the heir. As if the condition were that if the feoffor pay to the feoffee or to his heirs such a sum at such a day, there after the death of the feoffee if he dieth before the day limited, the payment ought to be made to the heir at the day appointed.\footnote{Littleton proceeds (sects. 340–343) to consider where the debt is to be paid or tendered. He recommends the feoffor to fix some definite place in the

It has been already seen that, at the time of Domesday, besides the liberi homines there was commonly a large class of persons of an inferior status, residing within the limits of the manor and bound as a general rule to render services upon the domain lands of the lord. The various names which prevailed at the time of Domesday and earlier cease to be recognised, and we hear only of villani, villeins. These were either villeins regardant, that is, attached to the land, in which case the right to the services of the villein passed with every alienation of the land; or villeins in gross, attached to the person of the lord, the right to their services being saleable by deed. It is with the former class that the history of the law of land is mainly concerned.

Where a villein was attached to the land, it followed as a matter of course that he had a permanent habitation, and the means of supporting himself and his family by the occupation of a plot of ground. This must have been the practice long before the Conquest, and was continued when the customary law of land was modified by the changes wrought by the Norman rule. When the judicial institutions of the country took the form in which they appear in the reign of Henry II, there was no forum in which the villein could assert his right to his land, at all events as against the lord. The courts baron of the manors were only for the freeholders of the manor, and the Curia Regis was in one point of view but the supreme court baron of the nation, and only took cognizance of freehold rights. The villein had no locus standi in either. At the same time, as has been pointed out in the third chapter, it became the practice to regard not so much the status of the villein, as the nature of his interest in land arising from the character of the services rendered to the lord, and thus freemen came to hold land 'in villenage,' and were little or no better off as to legal rights than the born villeins. The only legal protection, which either the villein or the freeman holding in villenage seems to have had against the lord in Bracton's time, was where the lord entered into a covenant with the tenant in villenage\(^1\).

---

1 See above, Chap. I. pp. 50-52 and Chap. III. § 13.

The lawyers described the position of the tenant in villenage by the expression that he held his land at the will of the lord\(^2\). But, as a matter of fact, the customs and practices which prevailed in the various manors tended to protect and perpetuate the interests of this class of tenants. Custom fixed the rights of the lord, the amount of service to be rendered to him, the heriots upon the death of the tenant, the fine on the admittance of a new tenant, the mode of succession and devolution of the lands to the tenant's eldest or youngest son or to all the sons alike, and so forth. These customs, though the institutions of the country afforded no means of enforcing them as against the lord\(^3\) by judicial action, were deeply rooted in the habits of the people, and in all probability the lord who ventured to set them aside and deprive the villein of his customary rights must have been exceptionally grasping and defiant of public opinion. Thus it is that throughout the period extending from Bracton to Edward IV we hear this class of tenants spoken of as if they had a recognised and legally protected interest in lands. Sir E. Coke\(^4\) points out that 'in H. V. 11 they be called copiholders, in 14 H. IV. 34 tenant per le verge, and in 42 E. III. 25\(^5\) tenant per rote solonque le volunt le seignior,'

\(^1\) See above, Chap. III. § 13.
\(^2\) 'For it is no more to say, "I hold the tenements in villenage of the Dean," etc., than to say, "I hold the tenements at the will of the Dean," etc.;' i.e. both are modes of describing the nature of the holding, not the status of the holder. Year Book, 20 Edw. I, p. 40.
\(^3\) It appears that as against a wrong-doer other than the lord the villein might sue by petition in the manor court. See Littleton, sect. 76, below.
\(^4\) Coke upon Littleton, 58 a.
\(^5\) A Prior brings a suit of trespass against one J. for breaking his close and carrying away his goods, to wit, corn, and the defendant pleaded that the
and in statute of 4 E. I, called Extenta Manerii, they are called custumarii tenentes.¹

It appears that the tenants in villenage were present at the manorial courts, not on a level with the freeholders or free suitors to the court,—who were the pares curiae, the judges of the court, by whose equal voice all matters were decided,—but in an inferior position. The customary heir would appear at the court and humbly request admittance to the land of his deceased father on payment of the customary dues; the tenant who had sold his holding in villenage would appear and surrender his land to the lord or his steward, and the purchaser would request admittance. These and similar transactions are recorded on the rolls of the court. The rolls of the court therefore contain the evidence of the customs of the manor, the authorised copy of the entry on the rolls of the court delivered to the tenant is his muniment of title, and gives him his name of ‘copyholder.’

Thus in dealing with this class of tenants the court baron assumed a new form, which comes to be distinguished from the original court baron, and to be called the Customary Court Baron or Customary Court. The freeholders are not, generally speaking, suitors at the Customary Court, except perhaps when questions arise upon the customs of the manors affecting their interests.² The functions of the court are administrative rather than judicial. The copyholders or ‘homage’ are not pares curiae. Their principal function is to make presentments upon matters concerning their interests and the customs of the manor. Their powers vary according to the customs of different manors. In some there is a custom for the lord to enclose, or to grant portions of the waste to hold as copyhold, with the assent of the homage, which is usually expressed by a sworn jury of copyholders. The lord, or more commonly the steward, presides over the court; it is his duty to receive and record the presentments of the homage.

---

¹ See above, Chap. IV, § 1.
² See Bacon’s Abridgment, Court Baron.

Gradually the interest of the copyholder came to be recognised by the regular tribunals. The great step seems to have been the recognition of the right of the tenant in villenage to maintain an action of trespass against his lord. Thus incidentally and gradually the courts of common law came to recognise and enforce the customs which had grown up in different manors; for example, the custom of allowing the eldest son to succeed his father in his holding, or of admitting as tenant the person to whom the previous holder had sold his rights. As the character of the rights depended upon the customs proved to prevail in the different manors, the rights of copyholders varied accordingly. We find various customs as to the rules of descent, duration of interest, modes of alienation, extent of power of user and otherwise, prevailing in different manors, the customs of each manor constituting the law prevailing therein. Except where altered by special custom, copyholds, as to duration of interest, time of enjoyment, mode of descent, joint tenancy and tenancy in common, in general resemble freehold interests.

Copyhold tenure presents in the main the same characteristics at the present day. Land held by copyhold tenure is always parcel of, and included in, a manor. The lord of the manor has the freehold, the copyholder holds 'at the will of the lord according to the custom of the manor.' The evidence of the nature and extent of his rights is to be looked for, primarily, in the court rolls of the manor. To

---

1 It was held in a case reported in the Year Book, 7 Edward IV, p. 19, that this was the appropriate remedy, and not a writ of subpoena, i.e. an application to the jurisdiction of the chancellor. It would appear from this case and the passage in Littleton (sect. 77, see below), that at this time various attempts were made to secure legal protection for the interest of the copyholder.
CHAP. V. these reference is made for ascertaining the various dues (fines, heriots, quit rents\textsuperscript{1}, and the like) which the copyholder must render to the lord. Here also is found the evidence of the mode of descent, mode of alienation, rights of the surviving husband or widow of the tenant\textsuperscript{2}, rights of the copyholder to common on the wastes of the manor\textsuperscript{3}, and so forth. For the lord being the freeholder, his rights of ownership remain untouched, except so far as they are limited by the copyholder’s rights which have supervened.
But inasmuch as the most important of the rights of ownership, the right of exclusion, is vested in the copyholder, a curious conflict sometimes arises. In some manors the copyholder may not cut timber or open mines, for these are rights belonging to the lord; but the lord cannot come upon the land to exercise them\textsuperscript{4}.

The copyholder has the free right of alienation, but the mode of alienation preserves curiously the history of the interest. The copyholder first surrenders the land to the \begin{footnotes}

\footnote{1} Quiet\textit{\textasciitilde} re\textit{\textasciitilde}titas because thereby the tenant goes quit and free of all other services. H. Blackstone, II. 42.

\footnote{2} The right of the widow of the copyhold tenant is called freehold. It resembles in most points dower of freeholds, except that usually it only attaches to the copyholds which the husband has at the time of his decease. J. Williams on Real Property, p. 400.

\footnote{3} The rights of common enjoyed by the copyholders are similar to those annexed to freehold tenements, and differ only in the title on which they rest.
While the freeholder can only claim common appurtenant to his freehold by virtue of a grant or by prescription, the copyholder’s right rests on the custom of the manor. In order to establish such customary right of common, the copyholder must adduce evidence of the general practice prevailing in the manor, and is not limited to prove that the right has been attached by grant or prescription to his own particular tenement.

\footnote{4} There is a species of tenure prevailing, especially in the north of England, called customary freehold. It has been much discussed whether a customary tenant, who is said to hold by copy of court roll but not at the will of the lord, is properly a freeholder—whether, in other words, the freehold is in the lord, or in the tenant. The better opinion appears to be that, generally speaking, the freehold is in the lord, though it may be in some cases in the tenant; and whether this is so or not is a question of fact to be ascertained by evidence as to the nature and extent of the rights possessed by the tenant.
See above, p. 130, n. 3, and Williams on Real Property, pp. 379–372.
\end{footnotes}
lord, and the lord then admits (and may be compelled to CHAP. V.
§ 6. admit) the nominee of the copyholder upon payment of the accustomed fine, if any.

In some manors there is a custom to entail lands, in others no such custom exists. If there is no such custom, an estate of copyhold given to a man and the heirs of his body will create a fee simple conditional, and, like an estate in fee simple conditional in freeholds before De Donis, may be alienated on the happening of the condition. Copyholds not being affected by the statute De Donis, the power of creating estates tail in copyhold lands must rest on a custom to entail. In like manner the power of barring the entail formerly depended on custom, and was effected either by a customary recovery or preconcerted forfeiture and regrant, or in some cases by a simple surrender. Since the Act for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries (3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 74) an estate tail in copyholds can be barred by a simple surrender with the concurrence of the protector where there is one.

The change in the position of the copyholder is thus summed up by Sir Edward Coke: 'For, as I conjecture, in the Saxons’ time, sure I am in the Normans’ time, these copyholders were so far subject to the lord’s will, that the lords upon the least occasion (sometimes without any colour of reason, only upon discontentment and malice, sometimes again upon some sudden fantastick humour, only to make evident to the world the height of their power and authority,) would expel out of house and home their poor copyholders, leaving them helpless and remediless by any course of law,

---

1 Formerly the proper remedy when admittance was refused was by application to the chancellor. See Spence, Equitable Jurisdiction, p. 648. The usual course in modern times has been to obtain a mandamus from a court of law.
2 See above, Chap. IV. § 3, and Doe on the demise of Spencer v. Clark, 5 Barnwell and Alderson’s Reports, p. 458.
3 See Williams on Real Property, p. 377.
4 Compleat Copyholder, sects. 8, 9.
and driving them to sue by way of petition. But now copyholders stand upon a sure ground; now they weigh not their lord’s displeasure, they shake not at every sudden blast of wind, they eat, drink, and sleep securely; only having a special care of the main chance, to perform carefully what duties and services soever their tenure doth exact, and custom doth require: then let lord frown, the copyholder cares not, knowing himself safe, and not within any danger. For if the lord’s anger grow to expulsion, the law hath provided several weapons of remedy; for it is at his election either to sue a subpoena, or an action of trespass against the lord. Time has dealt very favourably with copyholders in divers respects.

It might have been expected that so anomalous a class of rights as that which constitutes copyhold tenure would before the present time have been assimilated to the other forms of property in land. This however has not been done. Copyholds might at any period have been enfranchised (or converted into freeholds) by the conveyance of the freehold by the lord to the copyholder, or extinguished by surrender of the copyhold by the tenant to the lord. Various Acts have in recent times created facilities for this process by providing means for the assessment and commutation of the lord’s rights and otherwise; and at the present day either lord or copyholder may compel enfranchisement by taking the proper steps through the action of the Copyhold Commissioners.

Where copyholds have not been enfranchised (and there is still a large though gradually decreasing amount of land subject to copyhold tenure) the rights are still regulated entirely by custom. And inasmuch as the characteristics of this form of property depend entirely upon custom, they must have prevailed from a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. In practice this means that the customary usages should be shown to have existed as far back as available evidence goes, from which the legal inference arises that they have existed from time immemorial, that is, ever since the first year of Richard I.

1 This is the technical expression for proceedings in Chancery. See Chap. VI.

LITTLETON, c. ix. sect. 73. (Tenant by Copy.) Tenant by copy of court roll is as if a man be seised of a manor within which manor there is a custom, which hath been used time out of mind of man, that certain tenants within the same manor have used to have lands and tenements, to hold to them and their heirs in fee simple, or fee tail, or for term of life, at the will of the lord according to the custom of the same manor.

Sect. 74. And such a tenant may not alien his land by deed, for then the lord may enter as into a thing forfeited unto him. But if he will alien his land to another, it behoveth him after the custom to surrender the tenements in court into the hands of the lord, to the use of him that shall have the estate, in this form, or to this effect:—A. of B. cometh into this court and surrendereth in the same court a mease into the hands of the lord to the use of C. of D. and his heirs or the heirs issuing of his body, or for term of life, etc. And upon that cometh the aforesaid C. of D. and taketh of the lord in the same court the aforesaid mease, etc. To have and to hold to him and to his heirs, or to him and to his heirs issuing of his body, or to him for term of life at the lord's will, after the custom of the manor, to do and yield therefore the rents, services, and customs thereof before due and accustomed, and giveth the lord for a fine etc., and maketh unto the lord his fealty.

1 This date seems to have become fixed as giving a definite meaning to the expression 'time whereof' etc., in consequence of its having been fixed by the Statute of Westminster I (3 Edw. I, cap. 39) as the period of limitation in the case of a writ of right. Evidence therefore which shows that the custom alleged could not have prevailed in the time of Richard I has been held sufficient to show that the custom is not a legal one (see Bryant v. Foot, Law Reports, 3 Queen's Bench, 497). This principle however, notwithstanding the requirements of logic, must not be applied to copyholds; since, as has been seen, it cannot be maintained as an historical fact that copyhold estates existed at that time.

2 It should be observed that a surrender to the use of the alience has nothing to do with the uses of land discussed below in Chaps. VI. and VII.

3 And the lord is bound to admit the surrender.

4 The law still requires surrender by the tenant and admittance by the lord or his steward either in or out of the Customary Court or assemblage of copy-
SCAP. V. Sect. 75. And these tenants are called tenants by copy of court roll; because they have no other evidence concerning their tenements, but only the copies of court rolls.

Sect. 76. And such tenants shall neither implead, nor be impounded for their tenements by the king's writ. But if they will implead others for their tenements, they shall have a plaint entered in the lord's court in this form or to this effect: A. of B. complains against C. of D. of a plea of land, viz. of one messuage, forty acres of land, four acres of meadow, etc., with the appurtenances, and makes protestation to follow this complaint in the nature of the king's writ of assise of mort d'ancestor at the common law, or of an assise of novel disseisin, or formedon in the descender at the common law, or in the nature of any other writ, etc.¹

Sect. 77. And although that some such tenants have an inheritance according to the custom of the manor, yet they have but an estate but at the will of the lord according to the course of the common law. For it is said, that if the lord do oust them, they have no other remedy but to sue to their lords by petition; for if they should have any other remedy they should not be said to be tenants at will of the lord according to the custom of the manor. But the lord cannot break the custom which is reasonable in these cases.

But Brian, chief justice, said, that his opinion hath always been, no copyholder however need be present at a Customary Court (4 and 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 86). If the surrender be made out of court it was formerly necessary that the transaction should be mentioned or presented at the next court. This is no longer the case, an entry on the court rolls being sufficient (ib. s. 89). Admittance may now take place out of the manor and without holding a court (ib. s. 88). Formerly, when copyholds were devised, a previous surrender by the copyholder to the use of his will was necessary. This is no longer (55 Geo. III, c. 192. s. 1); nor is it necessary, as formerly, that the devisee should bring the will into the Customary Court and claim admittance; now a delivery of a copy of the will to the lord or his steward is sufficient.

¹ The action of ejectment was as applicable to the recovery of the possession of copyholds as of freeholds, and took the place of the remedy here described. The same fictions were applied to the one as to the other—a fictitious lease to a fictitious plaintiff by the person who was the real claimant, fictitious entry and fictitious outer by a fictitious wrong-doer, and permission to the real defendant to defend on the terms of his admitting the truth of the above fictions. See above, Chap. III. § 17, and Blackstone, iii. pp. 200–206.
and ever shall be, that if such tenant by custom paying his services be ejected by the lord he shall have an action of trespass against him. And so was the opinion of Danby, chief justice, in 7 Ed. 4.

For he saith, that tenant by the custom is as well inheritor to have his land according to the custom as he which hath a freehold at the common law.

1 Year Book, 21 Edw. IV, 80.
2 Ibid., 7 Ed. IV, 18.
APPENDIX TO PART I.

§ 1. Place of the Law of Real Property in the English System.

(1) In the preceding chapters the growth of the Common § 1.
Law relating to land has been traced to the point at which it may be said that it has attained to its full development.
The changes in the law of land which remain to be noticed are mainly due to the operation of Equity and Statute Law, working upon, and professing to leave unaltered to a great extent, the basis of the Common Law. At this point therefore it will be convenient to present in a tabular form a summary of the principal heads of arrangement or classification under which it appears that English private law may most appropriately be divided, with a view to show the place occupied in the English system by the law of land. By private law is meant that branch of the law which deals with the rights and duties ² of persons considered in their private or individual capacity, as opposed to the rights and duties which are possessed by and incumbent on persons or bodies of persons considered as filling public, i.e. political or constitutional positions or offices, or which have relation to the whole political community, or to its magistrates and officers.
Under private law, for example, are placed the class of rights and duties relating to property over things, or arising from

¹ The numerals relate to the various members of the classification shown below, Table I.
² For an analysis of the ideas involved in the words 'right' and 'duty' see Austin's Jurisprudence, especially lects. xii, xiv, xvi, xvii.
contracts or civil injuries; under public law the rights and duties of the king, parliament, judges, and criminal law¹.

(2) The rights and their corresponding duties which form the matter of English private law are first to be divided into two great classes, differing from each other in respect of the persons on whom the duties, which correlate to the right, are incumbent. A person may have a right the essence of which consists in the fact that all other persons whatsoever are under a duty corresponding to the right; or he may have a right the essence of which consists in the fact that the corresponding duty is incumbent on some one or more determinate person or persons. An example of the first class of rights is the right of property which a person has in or over a piece of land or a herd of cattle. All other persons whatsoever are bound to abstain from acts injurious to his power of dealing as he pleases with his own. In other words, he may enjoy, use, and, if he pleases, if the thing is perishable, use up, the thing which is the subject² of the right, subject only to certain general limitations, and also to certain special limitations prevailing in particular cases, where his rights are limited by conflicting rights possessed

---

¹ Mr. Austin objects to the classification of law as public law and private law. See Austin's Jurisprudence, i. pp. 69, 70; ii. lect. xlii. The distinction however is convenient, is generally recognised by continental jurists, and appears to rest on a fundamental distinction in the nature of the rights constituting the two classes. See Professor Holland’s Elements of Jurisprudence, pp. 78-82.

² I follow Austin in speaking of that over which the right is exercised, usually but not always a thing (i.e. a permanent external object, not a person, see lect. xiii), as the subject of the right. This seems more in accordance with the ordinary use of language than to apply the word ‘subject,’ as is usual with German jurists, to the person possessing the right. See Austin, ii. p. 736. Sometimes a person may be the subject of a right, e.g. the master has a right over the servant which entitles him to legal remedies against any one who wrongfully deprives him of the services of the servant; sometimes the right in res cannot be said to have any subject properly so called at all, e.g. the right to personal security, or to a good name and reputation. See Austin, i. p. 48. Professor Holland styles the person possessing the right ‘the person of inherence,’ and that over which the right is exercised the ‘object’ of a right. Jurisprudence, p. 63.
by other persons over the same subject. Rights of this class have received the name of rights in rem, an expression which means, not rights over things, but rights available against all the world, i.e. where a duty is incumbent on all persons whatsoever to abstain from acts injurious to the right.

(3) Opposed to rights in rem, or rights available against all the world, is the other great class of rights, namely rights which are available only against some particular or determinate person or persons. These are called rights in personam, which is an abridged expression for rights in personam certam or determinatam. The principal, though not in our law the only, sources of these rights are contracts and injuries. Where one person has entered into a contract with another, as, for instance, when he is bound by a promise to pay money, to deliver goods on a certain day, not to carry on a trade within a given area, a legal tie is created as between these two parties, the one has a right against the other, the one

---

1 See above, Chap. III. § 18.
2 The expression jus in rem, or jus in re, is not found in the classical jurists. The expression ‘in rem’ is however used by them in opposition to ‘in personam’. "‘En effet l’expression in rem désigne communément dans la langue du droit Romain, une disposition générale, sans exception de personne: et l’expression in personam désigne une disposition appliquée spécialement à une personne déterminée." Orlolan, Justien, iii. § 1556. See as to actions in rem and in personam, above, p. 69, n. 1. In our own law a judgment which is available in evidence against all the world is called a judgment in rem. See Austin, ii. p. 990; and on the general distinction between rights in rem and rights in personam, i. pp. 46, 380-389; Holland’s Jurisprudence, p. 92 and Chaps. XI, XII.

2 This points to the distinction between what are called by Austin primary and secondary or sanctioning rights; (see i. p. 45, and ii. lect. xlv); and by Professor Holland antecedent and remedial (Jurisprudence, p. 93 and Chap. XIII). The latter are those which arise from injuries or violations of primary rights. The former class are those which do not arise from injuries, but are created by the appropriate mode or title provided by law. Using ‘injury’ in a large sense, the rights constituting the second class arise from violations of rights in rem, or torts, and also from violations of rights in personam, or breaches of contract or trust. It will be seen that all rights in rem and some rights in personam are primary, while all secondary rights are rights in personam.
§ 1. is under a duty towards the other, and no third party or stranger to the contract shares either in the right or in the duty. So where any right, whether in rem or in personam, is violated, a new right in personam arises. If my right of excluding all persons from my house or field is violated by a trespasser, a new right as against that individual trespasser accrues to me, namely a right to adopt the appropriate remedy provided by the law. So where a person is bound by contract to deliver goods on a future day, or not to carry on a trade within a given area, the breach of the contract gives rise in each case to new and distinct rights, rights to pursue the proper legal remedy against the wrong-doer. It will be seen at once that rights in personam comprise some of the most important branches of the law, but they are here mentioned only to be excluded, since it is clearly not under that head that the law relating to land will be found.

(4) The law dealing with rights in rem may be called—using the term ‘property’ in a large sense—the law of property, or the law dealing with property-rights. The word ‘property’ is used in so many senses¹ as to be nearly useless for juristic purposes. One of its best known applications is where it is applied to any collection of rights in rem, as distinct from rights in personam. The Roman lawyers marked the difference between the two branches of law by the words domínium and obligationes. If the word ‘property’ were not so ambiguous, one might venture to suggest that the ‘law of property,’ or ‘of property-rights,’ should be substituted for the obscure expression rights in rem.

(5) Rights in rem may be subdivided into two great classes in respect of their subjects. By the subject of a right is meant the thing, if any, over which the right is exercised². My house, horse, or watch is the subject of my right of property. There are however some rights in rem which cannot properly be said to have any subjects, or to be exercised over any definite things. These will be noticed presently.

¹ See the principal of these enumerated, Austin, ii. pp. 817–820.
² See above, p. 256, n. 2.

(6) The great distinction next to be mentioned between two classes of rights in rem, differing in respect of their subjects, is peculiar to English law and the systems derived from it. In Roman law and the systems to which it has given rise there is no such fundamental distinction between the law relating to land and the law relating to things moveable, as to necessitate a separate treatment for each branch. It is otherwise in English law, and the outline of its history which has been given in the preceding chapters will account for this characteristic of our system.

The distinction therefore under consideration is between rights in rem, which have for their subject things real, that is to say, things immovable—in other words, land and all that is permanently affixed thereto; and rights in rem, which have for their subject things personal or moveable. Speaking generally, though not with entire accuracy, the former class of rights constitutes the matter of the law of ‘real property,’ the latter the matter of the law of ‘personal property.’ There is however one important class of rights over land, as has already been seen, which belongs to the category of personal property.

(7) There is further a miscellaneous class of rights in rem which cannot be said to be rights over land, or indeed to have any subjects at all, but which possess some characteristics common to rights over land. For instance, such of them as are descendible, devolve not, as is the case with personal property, to executors or administrators (see 8), but

---

1 Whether or not a thing can be said to be permanently affixed to land is a frequent subject of litigation, and there is a multitude of cases deciding in particular instances whether things are or are not ‘fixtures,’ and whether they are therefore to be treated as personal or as real property.

2 See Blackstone, ii. ch. 2.

3 See above, Chap. V. § 1.

4 See Blackstone, ii. ch. 3; and see Coke’s note on the word ‘tenements’ in the Stat. West. II, Coke upon Littleton, 19 b; above, p. 182.
§ 1. to heirs. These rights therefore are usually treated along with rights over land. Amongst the principal of this class of rights are advocons—advocationes, or the right of presentation to an ecclesiastical benefice; and franchises—where 'a royal privilege or branch of the king's prerogative is subsisting in the hands of a subject.' For example, the rights to have 'waifs, wrecks, estrays, treasure-trove, royal fish, forfeitures, and deodands' are franchises, which must rest on royal grant, or prescription which presupposes a grant. To this class too belong dignities, such as a peerage, which is the subject of grant by patent conferring the title with limitations similar to the limitations in an ordinary conveyance of land. Peerages may also be created by writ or royal summons to attend the house of peers; this, if acted upon, invests the person summoned with a dignity descendible to his heirs. Another instance of the class of rights in question is found in offices which are now seldom hereditary. An office tenable for life, such as a college fellowship, is considered a freehold interest. The class of rights under consideration is by Blackstone and others included under the class of incorporal hereditaments, together with another class which may be more conveniently referred to a different head. I have therefore marked them as Incorporal hereditaments A.

(8) Rights over things moveable, and rights which, though not over things moveable or indeed over things at all, are yet classed with such rights, inasmuch as they are rights in rem and, where they are descendible, devolve on executors or administrators (for example, patent rights, copyrights), lie beyond the scope of the present treatise.

(9) Having now pointed out briefly the place in the English system occupied by rights in rem, we pass to the immediate subject of the present treatise. At the head of his

---

1 See above, p. 171, note 2.
2 See Blackstone, ii, p. 37.
3 See for the explanation of these terms, and the royal prerogative in regard to them, Blackstone, i, ch. 8.
4 See Blackstone, i, p. 400.
5 See Austin, i, p. 400.
classification of rights over land Blackstone places the distinction between corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments. Unsatisfactory as this nomenclature is, it points to a fundamental distinction between two classes of rights in rem which it is convenient to take at the outset of a systematic discussion of the law of land. The distinction is between rights over land which entitle their possessor to speak of the thing as his own, and rights over land which is in ordinary language the property of another. It will be sufficient to style the former rights of ownership, the latter rights in alieno solo.

The word 'ownership' is here used as applicable to that class of rights which entitle the person having them to speak of the subject of the rights as his own. The great characteristic of these rights, according to Mr. Austin, is that the person having them may put the thing which is the subject of the right to uses which, though not unlimited (for no rights of user are wholly unlimited), are yet indefinite. Generally speaking, and within limitations more or less wide, tenant in fee, tenant for life, tenant for years can use the thing which is the subject of the right as he pleases—can do what he will with his own.

(1c) Opposite to these rights of indefinite user is the class of rights the very essence of which consists in the fact that the person having the right can only put the land which

---

1 Book ii, ch. 2. It should be remembered that Blackstone in his classification of rights followed to a great extent the masterly 'Analysis of the Law' of Sir Matthew Hale.

2 See Austin, lect. xlvii, xlviii. 'For the present I mean by property or dominion every right in and over a thing, which is indefinite in user, as distinguished from servitus.' ii. p. 821; and see Holland's Jurisprudence p. 132.

3 I do not forget that in common parlance we distinguish between tenant for years and the freeholder by saying that the former has the possession or occupation of the land, and that the latter only is the owner. But it is impossible to attempt to invest any word in common use with a technical meaning without running counter in some instances to popular usage. At all events the tenant-farmer talks of 'my farm,' and has the exclusive right of possession.
§ 1. is the subject of it to uses of a strictly defined and limited character\. A person who has a right of way over his neighbour's land can only use the land for the purpose of crossing it on foot or with horses or cattle, according to the nature of the right, which depends on the terms of the original grant by which it has been created, or on the extent to which the user has, as a matter of fact, been enjoyed for the time required by law to create the right. The rights which the creditor has under certain circumstances over his debtor's land may also be referred to the class of rights in alieno solo.

(II) These rights in alieno solo comprise a large portion of the rights called by Blackstone incorporeal hereditaments\(^2\). In fact the classes of rights in alieno solo styled easements

---

\(^1\) See Austin, lect. xlix; Holland's Jurisprudence, pp. 146-148.

\(^2\) The division of hereditaments into corporeal and incorporeal, though deeply rooted in our legal phraseology, is most unfortunate and misleading. The confusion is inherited from the Roman lawyers (see Justinian, Inst. ii. tit. 2), but has been made worse confounded by our own authorities. The Romans, misled by the double sense of res, unhappily distinguished res corporales and res incorporeae, the former being things 'quae tangi possunt, veluti aurum, vestis,' the latter mere rights, 'quae in jure consistunt.' It is obvious that this is mere confusion, the two ideas not being in pari materia, or capable of being brought under one class, or of forming opposite members of a division. Following the Romans, our lawyers distinguished between hereditaments as meaning the actual corporeal land itself, and another kind of hereditaments as not being the land itself but 'the rights annexed to or issuing out of the land.' A moment's reflection is sufficient to show that the distinction is untenable. The lawyer has nothing whatever to do with the material corporeal land, except so far as it is the subject of rights. It is the distinction between different classes of rights, and not between land on the one side and rights on the other, that he is concerned with. In such phrases as 'the land descends to the heir,' what is meant is, not that something happens to the land itself, but that a particular class of the ancestor's rights in relation to the land descends to the heir. The names 'corporeal and incorporeal' are most unfortunate, because if by 'corporeal' is meant 'relating to land,' then a large class of incorporeal hereditaments are also entitled to the name; if by 'incorporeal' is meant that they are mere rights, then all hereditaments are incorporeal, because the lawyer is only concerned with different classes of rights. In reality however it appears that the names point to different classes of rights, as indicated in the Table; and in fact, Stephen in his edition of Blackstone, 5th ed., vol. i. p. 648, almost confines incorporeal hereditaments to jura in alieno solo. See Austin, ii. pp. 707, 708.
and profits, marked Incorporal hereditaments B, together with those marked in the Table as Incorporal hereditaments A, seem to constitute the class of rights which Blackstone designates by that name.

(12) Taking incorporeal hereditaments in the narrower sense, as equivalent to the classes of rights in alieno solo named easements and profits, the principal characteristics of this class of rights have already been discussed \(^1\). The principal rights recognised by the law as easements properly so called are rights of way, i.e. of going over the land of another on foot, on horseback, or with carriages or cattle, in a certain line, or for certain purposes; water-courses, for example, where a person has the right to divert a flow of water to which, except for this special right, the owner of the praedium servium would be entitled; the right to discharge water or other matter upon a neighbour's house or land \(^2\); the right to restrain a use of land which obstructs the access of light and air to an 'ancient' window.

(13) Of profits, the principal are rights of common of various kinds, which have already been sufficiently dealt with \(^3\); rents (the right to a rent issuing out of the land, unconnected with the relation of landlord and tenant) may be classed under the same head \(^4\); as also might tithes have been before the Act for their commutation (6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 71).

(14) It appears to be more accurate to class creditors' rights under the head of rights in alieno solo; though in the earlier stages of our law, as has been seen above, the tendency in the case of mortgages was to make the right of the creditor after default absolute. As legal ideas progress and become more refined, the notion that the land is only a security for the debt comes into prominence, and regulates the real rights of the

---

\(^1\) See above, Chap. III. § 18.

\(^2\) 'Ut stilli dixit us vel flumen recipiat quis in aedes suas vel in areae, vel non recipiat.' Just. Inst. ii. tit. iii. § 1.

\(^3\) See above, Chap. III. § 18 (2).

\(^4\) As to rents, see above, p. 194.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Rights in Rem (2)</th>
<th>Rights in Personam (3)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>i.e. Rights available against all the world—</td>
<td>i.e. Rights available against some particular</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Property Rights (4)—</td>
<td>or determinate person or persons.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>divided in respect of their subjects (5) into</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Rights over Things Real = Immovable (6).</th>
<th>Not over Things Real (7).</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Over Things Personal = Moveable (8).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Incorporeal Hereditaments A.</td>
<td>(Advolosons, Franchises, Dignities, Offices, etc.).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Rights of Ownership (Corporal Hereditaments) (9).</th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Descendible to heirs (Subjects of Tenure) (18).</td>
<td>To Executors or Administrators,</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Leasehold Interests or</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Chattels Real (16).</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Freeholds (17).</th>
<th>Copyholds (18).</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

| |
|---|---|
| Incorporeal Hereditaments B (11). | Creditors’ Rights (14). |
| Easements (12). | Mortgages, Elegies, etc. |
| Profits (13). | |

NOTE: The figures relate to the preceding paragraphs.

THE LAW OF ENGLAND DEALING WITH PRIVATE RIGHTS AND THEIR CORRESPONDING DUTIES (1).
APPENDIX TO PART I.

265

§ 2.

§ 2. Rights over Things Real classified in respect of their duration.

The conception of an ‘estate’ in lands is a peculiar characteristic of English law. It is regarded, as has been seen, as an interest falling short of complete ownership, but capable of differences in extent or duration. Thus where an interest is given to A for life, and after his death to B for life, and after his death to C in fee, all these interests are regarded as estates, varying in duration or extent, and in the time of their coming into possession or enjoyment. The interest or right passes at once to the successive grantees. The grantor is regarded, not as parting with the whole ownership to A, with a proviso that after A’s death it is to go to B, and after B’s death to C, but as carving out of his estate two smaller interests or estates, and then as having still the fee simple or inheritance to give away, the grant of which exhausts all the interest in the lands which he has to bestow, which yet does not amount to the complete ownership of the land. Thus the fee simple is regarded as the largest estate—the nearest approach to absolute ownership—which the law recognises; an estate tail,

---

1 See above, Chap. V. § 5.
2 See above, Chap. III. § 17, and Chap. V. § 1.
3 See above, Chap. III. § 13, and Chap. V. § 6.
4 See above, pp. 44-48.
5 See below, Table III.
6 See above, p. 59, and Austin’s Jurisprudence, ii. p. 866.
Table II.

Rights over things real classified in respect of their duration.

- Where the interest devolves upon successors (heirs) in infinitum; i.e., where there is no assignable event, certain to happen, upon which the rights will come to an end.
  - Freehold Estates of Inheritance
    - Estates descendible to heirs general (collateral as well as lineal). *
      - Estates in Fee Simple. *
      - Estates descendible to lineal descendants. Estate Tail.
        - (a) General, Special.
        - (b) Male, Female.
    - Created by voluntary alienation
      - Estates for the life of the grantee.
    - Not created by voluntary alienation
      - Estates pur dante vie, or granted to last during the life of another.

- Where the interest does not devolve etc.; i.e., where there is some assignable event etc.
  - Freehold Estates not of Inheritance
    - Where the time of the happening of the event is certain, or can be made certain from its beginning.
      - Estates less than freehold, Leasehold Estates, (Chattels real).
        - Herein of Estates at Will, From year to year, On sufferance.
    - Where the time of the happening of the event is uncertain.
      - Dower. Curtesy.

---

Above, pp. 59, 84.
Chap. IV § 3, V. § 2.
Above, p. 136.
Above, p. 136.
Chap. III § 4.
Chap. III § 16.
Chap. V. § 1.
an estate for life, an estate for years are regarded as smaller or shorter interests, which cannot exist without the fee simple at the same time residing in some person other than him who has the smaller or 'particular' estate.

The classification given in Table II is in effect that of Blackstone in his chapters on Freehold Estates of Inheritance, Freeholds not of Inheritance, and Estates less than Freehold 1. It is sufficient to refer in the foot-notes to the Table to the passages in the preceding chapters where the various rights have been explained. It should be observed that all the interests in question which are capable of being created by grant may be conditional, i.e. may either actually come to an end, or be liable to be put an end to by the grantor, on the happening of some (specified but uncertain) event 2.

§ 3. Rights over Things Real classified in respect of the time of their enjoyment.

Table III shows the classification of rights given by Blackstone in his chapter on 'Estates in Possession, Remainder, and Reversion'. 3 In anticipation of explanations which will be given in Chapters VI, VII, and VIII, I have thought it convenient to oppose to the class of rights in question arising at common law, the class of rights of future enjoyment which do not arise at common law, the nature of which it would be at present premature to discuss. A glance at the Table will show the strange complication which prevails in this branch of English law, owing partly to historical causes, partly to the extreme technicality of lawyers whose minds were deeply imbued with the realist philosophy.

1 Book ii. chaps. vii, viii, ix.
2 See Blackstone, book ii. ch. x, and above, p. 220.
3 Book ii. ch. xi. See also Austin’s Jurisprudence, lect. liii, and above, Chap. V. § 3.
TABLE III.

RIGHTS OVER THINGS REAL CLASSIFIED IN RESPECT OF THE TIME OF THEIR ENJOYMENT.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Rights arising at Common Law</td>
<td>Rights not arising at Common Law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Resulting from a grant or other</td>
<td>Created expressly by grant</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>alienation of a particular estate.</td>
<td>or other alienation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Reversions¹.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Necessarily limited on (i.e. expressed to take effect in enjoyment immediately on the determination of) a particular estate. Remainsders².</td>
<td>Not necessarily limited on a particular estate. Leasehold interests in futuro.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Where the enjoyment of the estate awaits only the end of the particular estate. Vested remainders.</td>
<td>Where the enjoyment of the estate awaits not only the end of the particular estate but also the happening of some uncertain event, or the right is to vest in some person unborn at the time of the creation of the interest. Contingent remainders.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rights similar to those capable of arising at Common Law. Vested and Contingent Remainders and Leasehold interests in futuro created under Statute of Uses.</td>
<td>Created by instrument operating under Statute of Uses.³</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Freeholds in futuro. Springing uses.</td>
<td>In Equity⁴. (Follow same rules as last class.)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Freeholds arising in derogation of Freeholds. Shifting uses.</td>
<td>By Will⁷. Executory Devises. (Follow same rules.)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

¹ See above, Chap. V. § 3 (1). ² Chap. V. § 3 (2). ³ See above, p. 221. ⁴ See above, p. 222. ⁵ See below, Chap. VII. § 2. ⁶ See below, Chap. VIII. ⁷ See below, Chap. VII. § 4.
PART II.

THE MODERN LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.
CHAPTER VI.

ORIGIN AND EARLY HISTORY OF USES OR EQUITABLE INTERESTS IN LAND.

It is not easy to discover at what time the practice first arose of attaching to the alienation of land a trust or confidence that the alieene should hold the lands to the use of the donor, or of some third person named by him. When 'uses' are first noticed in the records of our law they appear as the result of established and well-known practice. Yet it was long before the obligation of a 'use, trust, or confidence' was recognised by any tribunal. It is true that the ecclesiastical courts at one time enforced conscientious obligations, entertaining suits de fidei lacione, but this jurisdiction is said to have been taken away from them in cases arising between laymen as to civil matters in the reign of Henry III¹. If therefore a feoffment was made to A to the use of B, or, in other words, in trust and confidence that A would permit B to enter and occupy, or receive the fruits and profits of the lands, there were no legal means of compelling A to carry out this trust. It was simply a conscientious obligation. No doubt such obligations were enforced by the authority of the confessor, and regarded with special favour by the Church.

¹ Spence's Equitable Jurisdiction, i. p. 118.
CH. VI. There seems no reason to question the common-place of the text-books, that the practice of giving lands by way of use or trust was largely resorted to in order to enable ecclesiastical corporations to evade the Statutes of Mortmain.1

Various conjectures have been made as to the origin of the recognition of the binding character of a trust, confidence, or use thus created. The clergy from early times recognised breach of faith as a matter of which the ecclesiastical courts would take cognizance. It is probable that some of the doctrines of Roman law greatly aided towards the establishment of the system of uses of land as a definite interest distinct from the legal estate. A strong analogy in some points to the system of uses is presented by the Roman distinction between legal and beneficial ownership.2 It was possible under the Roman system, before the changes introduced by Justinian, for a thing to have two owners. There was the legal owner, the dominus ex jure civili, or ex jure Quiritium, who was the complete owner in the view of the older law—who alone could dispose of or claim the thing by the processes recognised by the older law. He might however in certain cases pass to another the beneficial ownership without affecting his own legal rights in the view of the older law. If, for instance, the owner of a res mancipi—for example, a slave—sold the slave to another, and to the completion of the transaction there was alone wanting the appropriate ceremony of mancipatio—delivery accompanied by certain forms—the legal title remained unaffected, what passed to the purchaser was simply the beneficial, or, as it was barbarously

1 See Blackstone, ii. 271.
2 Compare Gaius, Comm. ii. 40: Sequitur ut admoveamus apud peregrinos quidem unum esse dominium, ita aut dominus quisque est, aut dominus non intelligitur. Quo jure etiam populus Romanus olim utebatur: aut enim ex jure Quiritium unusquisque dominus erat, aut non intellegebatur dominus:
sed postea divisionem accepti dominium, ut alius possit esse ex jure Quiritium dominus, alius in bonis habere. Nam si tibi rem mancipi neque mancipavero, neque in jure cessero, [the appropriate modes of conveyance under the older law] 'sed tantum tradidero, in bonis quidem tuis ea res efficitur, ex jure Quiritium vero mea permanebit,' etc.
called by the commentators, bonitarian ownership; in virtue of which the purchaser could in effect, by calling in aid the later Praetorian jurisdiction, assert and exercise practically all the rights of the real owner, only he could not employ the older and more cumbersome procedure of the jus civile.

This analogy however does not carry us further than the separation of the idea of legal ownership, or ownership at the common law, from beneficial ownership, that is ownership unrecognised by the older law, but the advantages of which can practically be asserted by calling in aid another power distinct from that of the magistrate enforcing the older law. The distinction between the two kinds of ownership was abolished by Justinian.

Another analogy was found in the Roman idea of ususfructus, or the right to the temporary enjoyment of a thing, as distinct from the ownership of, or absolute property in it. This analogy however fails at several points. There is no binding relation between the owner and the usufructuary, by which the former is compelled to hold to the use of the latter. The relation between the two rather resembles that of a tenant for life, or other limited owner, and the reversioner in fee.

Another analogy, which perhaps to some extent aided in the construction of the class of rights under consideration, is found in the doctrine of fidei commissa. The legal restrictions on successions and legacies led in the later period of the Republic to the practice of a testator instituting an heir, and at the same time requesting him to dispose of the whole or a portion of the property in a particular way, for example to hand over the inheritance or a legacy to a person who was not a Roman citizen, and therefore by the strict rule of the jus civile incapable of taking it directly. Till the time of

---

1 The classical expression for this beneficial ownership was 'in bonis habere' (see last note). Pothis, Dig. xli. tit. 1. ad init., distinguishes between 'dominum bonitarianum' and 'in bonis habere.'
2 Cod. lib. vii. tit. 25, 'De nudo jure Quiritium tollendo.'
3 See Just. Inst. ii. tit. 4.
4 Ib. tit. 23.
CH. VI. Augustus there appears to have been no legal obligation on the person to whom this trust was committed. Justinian says of these _fidei-commissa_, as they were called, ‘_Nullo vinculo juris, sed tantum pudore eorum qui rogabantur, continentur_’.
Afterwards the obligation came to be recognised as one capable of being enforced in the proper court, and a Praetor _fidei-commissarius_ was appointed to administer this branch of jurisdiction. At Rome ‘trusts’ could only be created by will, and under the later law the distinction for all practical purposes between _fidei-commissa_ and legacies disappeared.

Whatever may be the true account of the origin of the recognition of _uses_, it appears that the practice of conveying lands to _uses_ prevailed to a great extent as early as the reign of Edward III. It seems to have been not unusual for lay persons to make fraudulent _feoffments_ of their lands to evade their creditors. The result was that the creditor could not have execution for his debt, the land being in the hands not of the debtor but of his _feoffee_. The transaction being a 1 Inst. I. c. pr.

2 ‘Augustus . . . jussit consultus auctoritatem suam interponere. Quod
. . . paulatinum conversum est in asiduum jurisdictionem,’ etc. Ib. 1.
3 The earliest mention of the expression ‘_use_’ is found in the statute
7 Richard II, c. 12:—‘Et outre ceo est auxzit assentuz ce si assu alien eit puchaz ou desore puchaze assu bnefice de seinte eglise, dignite, ou autre, et en propre persone preigne possession dicoele, ou loouple de fait deix mesme le Roialme, soit il a son oope propre ou al oope dautri,’ etc.
4 ‘Item pur ceo ce diverses gentz inheritez des diverses tenements, creanceants diverses biens–en monode ou en marchandise des plusieurs gentz de Roialme, donnent leur tenements et chateux a leur amys par collusion davor est les profits a leur voleute, et puis senfuent a la franchise de Westminister ou Seint Martyn le Grant en Loundres ou autres tiex places privilegees, et illoques vivent long temps a grant countenance dastry biens et des profits des dits tenements et chateux, tanqo les ditz creditorz seront molt lez de prendre une petite parcellle de leur dette et relezer le remanant, ordeline est et wrongdoers from the claims of the rightful owners of the land. In the same reign the practice of evading the Statutes of Mortmain by giving lands to a feoffee to hold to the use of a religious corporation was effectually restrained by 15 Richard II, c. 5, given below. If therefore the practice of conveying lands to uses originated in the desire of the clergy to evade the Statutes of Mortmain, the device received a final check by this enactment. It seems, however, that the advantages of being the beneficial instead of the legal owner of lands were appreciated to such a degree that the practice, although it ceased to fulfil its original purpose, became more and more widely spread.

The use of lands came to be regarded as an interest wholly distinct from the legal estate, and free from all the burdens which attached to the tenancy at common law. If a person who had only the use of lands, (the legal title being vested in another person who was seized to his use,) committed treason or felony, the lands were not subject to escheat or forfeiture; he who had the use owed no duties or service to the lord; his creditor could not take the lands in execution for debt; nor could a rival claimant bring an action against him without the risk of the legal owner intervening and setting up his own legal title. On the other hand, he who had the use would have the full enjoyment of the lands, the seoffe to the use would allow him to be in possession and to reap the profits, and he could dispose of and sell his interest without the necessity of the cumbersome ceremony of livery of seisin, or assentuz qe si purra estre trovez qe tielx douns soient issint faitz par collusion qe les ditx creditours cient execution des ditx tenements et chateux auxi avaint come nul tiel donn nent euste este faite.' See 2 Richard II, stat. 2. c. 3.

1 The statute 1 Richard II, c. 9, is directed against the practice of persons wrongfully in possession of land, by disseisin or otherwise, making fee-fees of such lands to persons so powerful that the rightful claimants of the land, ‘for great menace that is made to them, cannot nor dare not make their persuais.’ In this case the ‘great man’ would hold the lands to the use of the wrongdoer.

2 Except in cases within 50 Edward III, c. 6.
of any formal conveyance. Further, he could create interests wholly unknown to the common law, and could even direct the devolution of the interest by his will. It is true that neither the interest of \textit{cestui que use}, as the beneficiary was called\footnote{If \textit{A}, tenant in fee simple, makes a feoffment to \textit{B} and his heirs to the use of \textit{C} and his heirs, \textit{B} is called \textit{feoffee to uses}, \textit{C} \textit{cestui que use}. These names will in future be employed to denote respectively the bare legal owner and the beneficiary.}, nor that of his alienee was protected or recognised by law; but in this case, as so often in the history of our law, usage laid the foundation of what afterwards became legal rights, and uses of land protected only by the obligations of conscience and good faith, of which the clergy were the guardians, were, it is said, by the time of Henry V the rule rather than the exception throughout the country\footnote{See Spence, Equitable Jurisdiction, i. p. 441, note c.}.

Thus a new species of interest in lands grew up differing wholly from any right recognised by the common law. What then was the foundation of the right of a person having a use, or, in other words, what was the nature of the obligation incumbent upon the person holding to the use?

At first, so far as is known, it appears to have rested simply on moral or religious obligation. There was no court or public functionary of any kind whereby the use would be protected. The only external authority by which the duty was enforced was that of the confessor. The common law courts knew nothing of \textit{cestui que use}, and the ecclesiastical courts were powerless to help him. It so happened that at the very time at which the practice of conveying lands to uses was becoming prevalent, a new jurisdiction was rising into importance, administering justice outside the pale of the common law. This was the jurisdiction of the Chancellor.

The ordinary functions of the Chancellor were of a very ancient date. As the keeper of the Great Seal, all grants and letters patent passed under his supervision. All original writs, by which actions at law were commenced, were issued out of Chancery and sealed with the royal seal. But in issuing these write the functions of the Chancellor were simply ministerial. He had no judicial authority. He could frame no new writ to meet a new state of circumstances. He was a prominent member of the Council, though subordinate to the great Justiciar so long as that office existed. As time went on the position of the Chancellor increased in importance. His close relations with the King armed him with a large measure of the royal power. His position as a great ecclesiastic made him solicitous for the interests of the Church, and familiar with the Canon and Civil Law.

In early times, when the various functions of the different departments of state were ill-defined, it was the common practice for persons aggrieved, especially when for any reason they could not avail themselves of the ordinary process of law, to present petitions to the Council or to the King for redress. If a poor man was oppressed by one who, as often happened, was powerful enough to set the ordinary process of law at defiance, the remedy was to be sought from the King or the Council, who alone were strong enough to do right. Or again, if a case arose in which no writ lay, and consequently in which there was no remedy to be had at common law, recourse could be had to the King or Council as the supreme depositaries of power. It appears that in the reign of Edward I it became usual for the King to refer such of these petitions as were addressed directly to him to the Chancellor. In the twenty-second year of Edward III a writ or ordinance was issued directing that for the future all such matters as were of grace should be referred to the Chancellor or to the Keeper of the Privy Seal. Hence the practice arose of presenting petitions directly to the Chancellor, upon which the Chancellor made decrees, giving

1 See Dialogus de Scaccario, I. v, Stubbs, Select Charters, 171, 177.
3 Ib. p. 335.
4 Ib. p. 337.
or withholding redress according to principles which were certainly not always those of the common law.

This practice, which dates from the end of the reign of Edward III, or the beginning of that of Richard II, may be taken to be the cause of the rise of the judicial functions of the Chancellor. Upon petitions thus presented, the Chancellor would, if he thought fit, issue a writ, called a writ of subpœna, in the name of the King, commanding the person complained of to appear and answer the matter alleged against him and abide by the order of the court. This was called the writ of subpœna from the usual addition of the words sub poena centum librarum. This penalty however was not commonly exacted, but from the earliest times it seems to have been the practice to enforce the decrees of the Chancellor by attachment, that is, by arrest and imprisonment for contempt of court. Thus the Chancellor, unlike the courts of common law, had power to order things to be done, to decree that a contract should be performed, that property should be given up, that a thing creating a nuisance should be removed. From the writ above mentioned, the common expression in the older law books for a proceeding in Chancery is a 'writ of subpœna.'

The materials on which our knowledge of the early history of the jurisdiction of the Chancellor is based are very scanty. But very few cases decided by the Chancellor found their way into the Year Books. Amongst the public records are some petitions to the King referred to the Chancellor in the reign of Edward I. There have been also published three volumes of Calendars of Proceedings in Chancery in the time of Queen Elizabeth, to which are prefixed the earliest Petitions to the Chancellor which have yet been discovered. These are of the date of Richard II. The grounds upon which redress was sought are of a very miscellaneous character. The burden of all the petitions is that a grievance has been sustained, for which, for one reason or another, no remedy can be had at the common law.

1 See Spence, Equitable Jurisdiction, i. pp. 338, 569.
2 The case given below from the Year Book of 18 Edward IV appears to have been decided by the Chancellor sitting alone, that in 7 Edward IV to have been before the Chancellor and the Judges of the Common Pleas and King's Bench.

Probably the most usual ground on which complaints to the Chancellor were based was that the person whose acts were complained of was too powerful to be touched by the common law. But there was another and an increasing ground for the interference of the Chancellor. This was the inadequacy of the common law to meet the wants of an advancing community. Practices had become common giving rise to what were considered to be rights and duties, upon the faith of which men acted, but which were wholly unrecognised by the common law. An attempt had been made by the statute of 13 Edward I, c. 24, to adapt the procedure of the common law to new cases as they arose. By that statute it was provided that 'whenever from henceforth it shall fortune in the Chancery that in one case a writ is found, and in like case falling under like law and requiring like remedy is found none, the clerks of the Chancery shall agree in making the writ, or the plaintiffs may adjourn it until the next Parliament, and let the cases be written in which they cannot agree, and let them refer themselves until the next Parliament, [and] by consent of men learned in the law a writ shall be made, lest it might happen after that the Court should long time fail to minister justice unto complainants.' This statute did not immediately produce any great effect. The new writs, though framed in the Chancery, were adjudicated upon by the common law judges, who were tied and bound by precedent, and refused to recognise rights which had never been recognised before.

There was therefore abundant room for a new tribunal. Conspicuous among the practices which the common law refused to recognise, but which still were commonly observed, was that of giving lands to be held to uses. Here therefore was a field for the jurisdiction of the Chancellor. There are however but few traces of the early jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery affecting uses of lands. Nevertheless it is easy to see a combination of influences which brought the practice under the protection of the Chancellor. The obligation being one morally binding, resting on good conscience and good faith, would fall within his cognizance as an ecclesiastic. His clerical character, habituating him to search into men’s consciences and motives, rendered his tribunal far fitter than a jury for ascertaining the intention accompanying the outward act of transferring lands. The practice before the statute of Richard II would also recommend itself to him as beneficial to the interests of the Church. And uses of lands being wholly unrecognised by the common law, and yet the practice having attained the force of a custom, and many interests depending upon it, the Chancellor would be resorted to as the depository of the undefined prerogatives of the Crown, in an age when the limits of the administrative, legislative, and judicial functions were not clearly marked out.

So far however as any evidence has yet been discovered, it is not till the reign of Henry V that any application is recorded as having been made to the Chancellor to protect uses of lands. In the reign of Henry IV, so far from the jurisdiction being regularly established, the Commons complained that many grantees and feoffees in trust alienated and charged the tenements granted, for which there was no remedy, and they prayed that one might be provided by Parliament. In the reign of Henry V occurs the first complaint of breach of trust in the bills in Chancery published by the Record Commission. They become more common in the reigns of Henry VI and Edward IV. It was during these reigns that the jurisdiction of the Court

---

1 See as to this the report of the case in the Year Book, 4 Edward IV, given below.

2 Spence, Equitable Jurisdiction, I. p. 443.
of Chancery affecting uses of lands began to be systematized, and to follow regular rules.

It is necessary at this stage to keep clearly in view the two opposing but related interests—that of feoffee to uses, or, to use a more modern expression, trustee, and that of cestui que use, or the person beneficially interested.

The feoffee to uses is alone recognised by the common law as entitled to the land. It is from him that every aliee who is to take a legal interest must receive his title; he, and he only, is recognised as the tenant to the lord; his treason alone is the cause of forfeiture; for his debts alone can the land be taken in execution. The law knows nothing of any third person who is free from the burdens while he reaps the profits of the tenancy.

Supposing however that the feoffee attempts to exercise his legal right by alienating or charging the lands, he would, at the time we are now speaking of, be restrained from doing so, by the extra-legal, or, if the expression may be allowed, supra-legal power of the Chancellor,—a power, as has been seen, stronger than the law. Further, the Chancellor having power not only to restrain wrong-doing, but to command the performance of acts, would order the feoffee to do any lawful acts of disposition which cestui que use may require of him. He would be constrained to convey his legal interest to cestui que use or his heir, or to a purchaser from him; to convey to the person named in cestui que use’s will; to make the provision required by him for his family; to make a portion for his wife, or for payment of his debts; and to prosecute all

1 See the petition (2) given below; and see Cal. i. p. xx; ii. pp. xxii, xxviii, xxxi, xxxvi.
2 Rothanhale v. Wythingham, Cal. ii. p. iii. This is one of the earliest cases in the reign of Henry V. It states a feoffment made in the sixth year of Richard II, the feoffor declaring by a separate deed his will to be that after his death the feoffees should hold the lands to the use of the feoffor’s wife for life and his son in fee. The son disposed of his interest by his will, and the object of the petition is to force the feoffees to carry out the dispositions of the father’s settlement and the son’s will. See also Cal. ii. p. xxviii; i. p. xxi, etc.
3 Cal. ii. pp. xxiii, li.
actions necessary for the protection of cestui que use's interest.

The earliest conception of a use was, as has been seen, a trust binding on the conscience of the feoffee, a personal obligation upon him. It followed that on the death of the feoffee the heir who succeeded him was discharged of the trust, no conscientious obligation affecting him ever having been created. But in the reign of Edward IV, if not earlier, the heir of the feoffee was held to take the lands subject to the same trusts as his ancestor held them. The same rule was extended to the case of a person taking by alienation for valuable consideration from the feoffee, and having notice of the use. A purchaser for valuable consideration without notice held the lands free from the obligation, and in that case the only remedy of cestui que use would be against the feoffee personally. In like manner the lord who came into possession on an escheat, the creditor upon an elegit, or the husband or wife by virtue of curtesy or dower, held the land free and discharged from the use.

---

1 Cal. I. p. xlviii.
2 See Goold v. Petit, and Saundre v. Gaynesford, temp. Henry VI (Cal. ii. pp. xxviii, xxxviii). In both these cases it is sought to compel the heir of feoffee to uses to make a conveyance to cestui que use. See however Year Book, 8 Edward IV, 6: 'And it was moved whether a subpoena would lie against the executor or against the heir [of feoffee to uses]. And Choke said, that he on one occasion sued out a subpoena against the heir of a feoffee to use, and the matter was discussed at great length. And the opinion of the Chancellor and of the Justices was that it did not lie against the heir, wherefore he sued out a bill in Parliament. Fairfax: Cest matter est bon store pur disputar agree quant les autres revoignent.' And see Year Book, 22 Edward IV, 6; where in answer to an observation by the Chancellor that records existed in the Chancery of cases where subpoenaas had been granted against the heirs of feoffees to uses, Hussey, Chief Justice, states that all the judges had agreed thirty years before that a subpoena would not lie against the heir. The Chancellor however said that if the law was as stated by Hussey, 'donques est grand folie pur enfeoff autres en mon terre.'
3 Year Book, 5 Edward IV, 7 b: 'If J. enfeoffed A. to his own use, and A. enfeoffed R., although he purchased for valuable consideration, if A. gave R. notice of the intent of the first enfeoffment, he (R.) is bound under pain of a writ of subpoena to perform the will of J.'
4 If no valuable consideration passed, notice of the use was implied.
In tracing the history of the law of uses it is necessary shortly to enumerate the chief characteristics of uses before the legislation to be noticed in the next chapter. It follows, from what has been said as to the origin of uses, that the feoffee to uses must be an individual capable of the conscientious obligation. Hence a body corporate is incapable of holding to the use of any one. Nor were aliens, or persons attained, or the king, capable of holding to a use.

The Court of Chancery in establishing rules regulating the interest of _cestui que use_ in some respects followed the rules of law, in others departed from them. 'Equity follows the law' in respect of uses principally in holding these interests to be subject to the same rules as to the duration and devolution of the estate as in the case of the legal interest. For instance, if a feoffment be made to B and his heirs to the use of C and his heirs, or to the use of C and the heirs of his body, or to the use of C for life, or to the use of C for ten years, C would have an equitable estate in fee which would descend to his eldest son, or to all his sons in gavelkind lands, or to his youngest in borough English; or an estate tail, which might be further limited so as to be an estate in tail special or general, male or female; or an estate for life; or an estate for years, which upon C's dying within the term would devolve upon his executors.

On the other hand, the wife or husband of _cestui que use_ was not entitled to dower or curtesy, nor was the lord entitled to escheat on failure of heirs, nor, except so far as

---

1 Gilbert on Uses, ch. i. sect. 1. It was to avoid the consequences of this rule that it was provided by the statute 1 Richard III, c. 5, that where Richard was enfeofed to uses jointly with other persons the land should vest in the co-feoffees; where he was the sole feoffee, it should vest in _cestui que use_. Blackstone, ii. p. 332.

2 See Bregarland v. Calche, Cal. ii. p. xxxvi.

3 'If tenant in borough English enfeof one to the use of himself and his heirs, the younger son shall have the subpoena, and not the heir general.' Year Book, 5 Edward IV, 7 b.

4 Sugden's Gilbert on Uses, ch. i. sect. 2. 1.

5 Ib. pp. 48, 49.
certain changes were introduced by legislation, was the king entitled to forfeiture, or the creditor to take the lands in execution 1.

But the widest difference between the rules of common law and those which prevailed in the Court of Chancery is to be found in the manner in which uses of lands could be created or transferred. The simplest and most ordinary way of creating a use has already been referred to. For example, A, tenant in fee simple, makes a fee simple, makes a fee simple, to B and his heirs, to the use of C and his heirs. Uses might also be created by a fine or recovery levied or suffered to an expressed use. In these cases uses are said to be created by a conveyance operating by way of transmutation of possession 2; that is, they accompany one of the recognised modes of conveying the seisin at common law—feoffment, fine, or recovery. An expression of the intention of the donor that the donee should hold the lands granted to certain uses was sufficient to burden the donee with the duty of holding to the use of cestui que use.

But in some cases uses were said to be raised by implication; that is, though no use was expressed in the grant, yet the circumstances were such that the Chancellor would declare that the donor intended the donee to hold, not for his own benefit, but as donee to uses. This arose principally in the case where the fee simple or other conveyance was made without consideration, that is, without an adequate motive. In this case the doctrine of the Court of Chancery was that the intention of the donor must have been that the donee should hold not for his own benefit, but for the use and benefit of the donor. The use was said to result or come back to the donor 3. Two kinds of consideration alone were regarded as affording a sufficient motive; these were blood or money. Blood, or, in other words, natural affection felt towards a near relative, would be sufficient to vest in a son,

1 Suiden's Gilbert on Uses, ch. i. sect. 2. 5. 6.
2 Ib. ch. i. sect. 5. and Introduction, p. xlvii.
3 Ib. ch. i. sect. 5. 1; sect. 6, p. 117.
brother, nephew, or cousin, the beneficial as well as the legal interest, if the intention of the donor were expressed in a deed\(^1\). This however commonly took the form of a covenant to stand seised, to be presently noticed. The other consideration was money\(^2\), and here, so long as the conveyance is expressed to be made for a money consideration, the amount is immaterial; it is, at all events, sufficient evidence of the intention of the donor to part with the beneficial as well as the legal interest in the lands. If no proper evidence of either of these motives existed, the beneficial interest resulted or came back to the donor. It was in fact only an instance of the practice which seems to have become very common about the time of the Wars of the Roses, so that ‘the use of the country to deliver lands to be safely kept has made the mere delivery of possession no evidence of right without a valuable consideration\(^3\).’ This however did not apply to the case of a grant for life or years.

Uses raised by a conveyance operating by transmutation of possession are distinguished from uses raised without any such transmutation. Under certain circumstances a person, though he had done nothing which would be regarded at common law as a parting with his legal interest, was constrained by the Chancellor to hold to the use and benefit of another. This arose principally in the two cases of bargains and sales, and of covenants to stand seised.

A bargain and sale was where the legal owner entered into an agreement with a purchaser for the sale to him of his interest, and the purchaser paid, or promised to pay, the money for the land. The transaction would not be complete at law without a legal conveyance; but in Equity a use was ‘raised’ in favour of the purchaser, the bargainor was in the view of the Chancellor the bare legal owner, holding to the use and for the benefit of the bargainee\(^4\).

A covenant to stand seised was where a person by deed

\(^1\) Sugden’s Gilbert on Uses, p. 93.
\(^2\) Ib. p. 94.
\(^3\) Ib. p. 125.
\(^4\) Ib. pp. 94-95.
agreed to stand seised to the use of some near relation—son, brother, nephew, or cousin. In this case the consideration of natural affection was sufficient to raise a use in favour of the covenantee.\(^1\)

When by any of the above methods the interest of cestui que use had been created, that interest might, without any formality, by words or acts evidencing the intention, be transferred by cestui que use to any one capable of taking a use.

Another mode by which uses could be raised or transferred was by will. An instance will be found below of a feoffment made on a death-bed to the use of a will. After the death of the feoffor the feoffee would be constrained to hold to the uses declared. Thus if A made a feoffment to B and his heirs to the uses declared by his last will, and declared a use in favour of C and his heirs, the use would, until A’s death, result or come back to him. Upon A’s death C could claim by virtue of the will to be the equitable or beneficial owner. So a use vested in cestui que use could be devised by him. For example, if cestui que use devised that his feoffees should alien the land for payment of his debts, the creditors might compel them in the Court of Chancery to do it.\(^2\) Thus by the medium of uses the power of disposing of interests in lands by will was for all practical purposes regained, and was so firmly established as to withstand the attempt made in the reign of Henry VIII to restrain it by legislation.\(^3\) It should be remembered that no formality, not even writing, was required to establish a will; any evidence of the expression of the intention of a testator would be sufficient to raise a use by which the next legal owner would be bound.

Various consequences as to the capacity of dealing with the beneficial interest in lands followed upon the introduction of uses besides those above pointed out. Of these the most important were—(1) that a man might convey the beneficial interest in lands to himself. This practice, as has before been observed, was largely resorted to in troubled times when a freehold tenant wished to retain the benefits, and escape the burdens, attaching to the legal estate in lands. (2) A man might convey a beneficial interest to his wife. The Chancellor did not consider himself bound by the stringent doctrine of the common law that a married woman was incapable of holding separate property. A use declared in favour of a woman would be enforced whether the woman was married at the time or married afterwards. Thus it became a common practice for a man upon his marriage to convey lands to feoffees to the joint use of himself and his wife for life or in tail, by which means a provision for the remainder of her life was secured to the wife. This was called a jointure. Before the Statute of Uses, mentioned in the next chapter, the wife might have claimed dower in addition to this provision; by that Statute, however, when provision was made for the wife by jointure, she was put to her election whether she would claim dower or jointure, but was not allowed to claim both. Thus were laid the foundations of one of the principal classes of rights created by the Court of Chancery, the Equitable Estate of Married Women.

\(^1\) Sugden’s Gilbert on Uses, pp. 92–94.

\(^2\) Ib. p. 75.

\(^3\) See below, Chap. VIII.

(3) Interests in lands too might be created by way of use to commence and terminate at times and in ways which the doctrines of the common law would not permit. It has already been seen that where one person desired to convey lands to another at common law, he must do so either by feoffment with livery of seisin, which was the regular mode of transfer, or by the fictitious processes of fine or recovery, or by conveying a particular estate by lease for years and entry, or by lease for life with livery of seisin followed by a release of the reversion to the lessee, or by a grant of the reversion to 1 Sugden's Introduction to Gilbert, p. xlviii. The rights of married women to acquire, hold, and dispose of Property real or personal, now depend on the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 75.

2 See above, Chap. III. § 12.
3 See above, Chap. II. § 8; Chap. V. § 2.
a third person, in which latter case the lessee for years must attorn to the grantee of the reversion in order to give complete effect to the grant. The foundation of all these modes of conveying interests in lands was open and notorious transfer of possession; the point at which the freehold interest passed out of the grantor and vested in the grantee was marked by an actual change of possession (unless indeed the grantee was already in actual possession), or, in the case of a fine or recovery, by an acknowledgment in open court. Thus it was that freehold interests to take effect in possession or enjoyment at a future time could only be created by way of remainder, as has been explained in the fifth chapter. No such rule, however, restricted the freedom of the Chancellor in enforcing uses. There was no reason why the intention of the donor should not be carried into effect at a future period.
Thus a feoffment to A and his heirs, and after next Christmas to the use of B and his heirs, would be carried out according to the expressed intention of the donor. So a use might be raised on the happening of any future event, or the expiration of any specified time. Thus while at common law, as has been pointed out, a fee could not be limited after a fee, this might in effect be done with the use. A conveyance to A and his heirs so long as he continued unmarried, and upon his marriage to the use of B and his heirs, would cause the use upon the happening of the event to arise and spring up and vest in B; in other words, A, upon his marriage, while remaining legal owner, would be constrained by the Chancellor to hold to the use of B. Thus a power was acquired of creating future interests in lands and of causing interests in lands to be shifted and to pass from one person to another, which was unknown to the common law, and which, as will be seen in the next chapter, gave rise to the complicated system of conveying which prevails at the present day.

1 See above, Chap. V. § 3 (1).
2 See above, p. 219.
15 Richard II. c. 5.

I. 15 Richard II, cap. v.

Item cone contenus soit en lestatut de Religiouzes, que null religious autre queconque achate ne vende, ou sous couler de don ou terme ou autre title queconque dascun recevre, ou dascun en ascune manere par art ou par engyn a luy face approprier ascunes terres ou tenements, sur forfeiture dycelles, par quoi les ditz terres et tenements purront en ascune manere devenir a mort mayn; et que si ascun religious ou ascun autre veigne encontre le dit estatut par art ou par engyn en ascune manere, bien lise au roi et as autres seignurs les ditz terres et tenements entrer, sicome en le dit estatut est contenuz plus au plein; et ore de novell par sotile ymageination et par art et engyn ascuns gentz de religion, parsons, vikers, et autres personnes espiriciels sont entrez en diverses terres et tenements adjoignants a leur egilse, et dycelles par suffrance et assent de tenantz ont fait cimitors, et par bulles del appostoill les ont fait dedier et sacrer, et sepulture parochiele font continuelment en ycelles sanz licence du roi et des chiefes seignurs; declare est en cest parlemente que ce est overtlement en cas du dit estatut. Et en outre accordez est et assentuz que toutz ceux que sont possessione par fooffement ou par autre voie al oeps de gentz de religion ou autres personnes espiriciels des terres, tenements, fees, advoezons, ou autres possessions queconques, pur les amortiser, et dont les ditz religiouses et personnes espiriciels preignent les profitz, que parentre cy et le fest de Saint Michel prochein venant ils les faizent estre amortises par licence du roi et des seignurs, ou autrement quils les vendent et alienment a autre oeps parentre cy et le dit fest, sur peine destre forfait au roi et as seignurs, solonc la fouure de lestatut de religious, come tenements purchasez par gentz de religion, et que de cest temps enavanant null tiel purchase se face, issent que tiel religiouses ou autres personnes espiriciels ent preignent les profitz come desus sur la peine avauandite. Et mesme cest estatut sextende et soit tenuz de toutz terres, et tenements, fees, advoezons, et autres possessions purchasez, et a purchasers al oeps des gildes et fraternitees. Et enoute est assuntuz pur ce que mair, baillis, et communnes de citees, burghs, et autres villes, quont commune perpetuel et autres quont offices perpetuels sont aussi perpetuels comme gentz de religion, que de cest temps enavanant ils ne purchasez a eux et a leur commune ou office sur la peine contenue en la dit estatut de religiouses.

1 See above, p. 275.
2 See Chap. IV. § 2.
Et de ce qu'autres sont possessionez ou serra purchasez en temps avenir a lour oeps, et ils ent preignent ou prendront les profitz, soit semblablement fait come devaunt est dit de gents de religion.

Translation.

Whereas it is contained in the statute De Religiosis, That no religious, nor other whatsoever he be, do buy or sell or under colour of gift, or term, or any other manner of title whatsoever, receive of any man, or in any manner by [gift] or engine\(^1\) cause to be appropriated unto him any lands or tenements, upon pain of forfeiture of the same, whereby the said lands and tenements in any manner might come to mortmain; and if any religious, or any other, do against the said statute by art or engine in any manner, that it be lawful to the king and to other lords upon the said lands and tenements to enter as in the said statute doth more fully appear; and now of late by subtle imagination and by art and engine some religious persons, parsons, vicars, and other spiritual persons, have entered in divers lands and tenements, which be adjoining to their churches, and of the same, by sufferance and assent of the tenants, have made church yards, and by bulls of the Bishop of Rome have dedicated and hallowed the same, and in them do make continually parochial burying without licence of the king and of the chief lords; therefore it is declared in this Parliament, That it is manifestly within the compass of the said statute; and moreover it is agreed and assented, that all they that be possessed by feoffment or by other manner to the use of religious people, or other spiritual persons, of lands and tenements, fees, advowsons, or any manner other possessions whatsoever, to amortise them, and whereof the said religious and spiritual persons take the profits, that betwixt this and the feast of St. Michael next coming they shall cause them to be amortised by the licence of the king and of the lords, or else that they shall sell and alene them to some other use, between this and the said feast, upon pain to be forfeited to the king and to the lords, according to the form of the said statute of religious, as lands purchased by religious people; and that from henceforth no such purchase be made, so that such religious or other spiritual persons take thereof the profits, as afore is said, upon pain aforesaid; and that the same statute extend and be observed of all lands, tenements, fees, advowsons,

\(^1\) 'Craft, or ingenuity.'
and other possessions purchased or to be purchased to the use of guilds or fraternities. And moreover it is assented, because mayors, bailiffs, and commons, of cities, boroughs, and other towns which have a perpetual commonality, and others which have offices perpetual, be as perpetual as people of religion, that from henceforth they shall not purchase to them and to their commons or office upon pain contained in the said statute De Religiosis. And whereas others be possessed, or hereafter shall purchase to their use, and they thereof take the profits, it shall be done in like manner as is afore said of people of religion.

2. The following three cases are taken from the volumes of Calendars of Proceedings in Chancery above referred to. The first is interesting, as being the earliest recorded case of an application to the Chancellor to enforce a feoffment to uses. The points which the cases illustrate have already been sufficiently dwelt upon.

(1) Proceedings in Chancery in the reign of Henry V. William Dodd v. John Browning and another. (Calendar of Proceedings in Chancery, i. p. xiii.)

To my worthy and gracious Lord Bisshope of Winchester,

Chancellor of England.

Beseeching mekely youre povre bedeman William Dodd, charyoteer, wheche passed over the see in service with our liege lord, and was uno of his charioterys in his viages; and of hyze treste fiefed in my land John Brownyng and John . . . of Chekewell1 with my wyfe, wheche John, and John afterwards azenste my wyll and wetynge pot my land to ferme, and delyvered my mevable good the valewe of xx marke where hem lest, and thus they kepe my dede and the indenture with my mevable good unto myne undoyng, lasse than y have youre excylent and gracius helpe and lordship; bescheinge yow at reverence of that worthy Prince ys sowle youre fader, whoo bedeman y am ever, that ye woll sende for John, and John afferseide, that the cause may be knowe why they withholde my good to myne undoyng; also wheche am undo for brusinge in service of our liege lorde, and in service of that worthy Princesse my lady of Clarence, and ever wolde yef my lemys myght serve worthy prince son. At reverence of God and of that percles Princes his moder take this matter at hert of almes and charite.

1 Feoffes to uses.

(2) William of Arundel, Esq. v. Sir Maurice Berkeley, Knight, and others. (Calendar, i. p. xxxv. Temp. Henry VI.)

Besechith mekeley William of Arundell esquier that for as moche as John, somme tyme Lord of Arundell and of Mautravers his fader, wham God asseile, enseoffed Robert Lord Ponyngges and William Ryman yet on lyve, and dyverse other persons nowe dede, yn his manors of Hyneford, Spertegrove, Stoketristre, Cokelyngton, Bayford, and Lyghe yn the counte of Somerset wyth the officis of the kepyng of the forest of Seld-wode yn the same counte, to the extent that the said feooffes should performe his wille, whiche he would afterward declare touchyng the seid manors and officis. And afterward by his dede ensealed wyth the scale of his armys, declarid his seid wille touchyng the seid manors and officis forseid, yn soche forme as the seid nowe besecher owyth to have the forseid manors and officis to hym and to the heirs of his body cometg; as by the seid dede of declaracion of his wille hit pleylyn may appere. And afterward the seid late Lord of Arundell dyed; after whos deth John late Erle of Arundell his sonne and heir, the seidfeofment noteystondying, entred yn the seid manors and occuped the seid office, enlaymyng the same manors and office as sonne and heir; and than of the same manors and office enseoffed Mores Berkeley knyght, John Hody, William Sydeney, John Lylle and John Greedon clerk yn fee, to the extent to performe his wille, the whiche he wolde afterward declare, touching the seid manors and office. And afterward by his lettur wretyn wyth his oone hand at Rome, yn Seynt Martyn's day, the yere of the reigne of our soverayn Lord the Kyng that nowe is the xiii, dyrecte unto Alianore countesse of Arundell his moder, and also lady and moder to the seid besecher, declared openly that hit was his wyll1, that a state shoule be made to the seid besecher his brother, yn all the said manors and office, according to the wille of his seid fader, yn the most surest wyse; which writyng nought withstanding, and that the seid besecher hath ofte tymys requyred the forssaid Morys and his seid coofcooffees to 1 Notice the informal character of these early wills. In one case it is a deed of declaration of trust, in the other a letter that is considered to operate as a will. See below, Chap. VIII. have made a state of the forseid manors and office to the same beseecher, and to his heirs of his body begete, accordyng to the willes, as well of his seid lord and fader, as of his forseid lord and brother; whiche the seid Mores and his seid coofees have all weye refuseid and yet refuse to doo, to the lykly dis-heritance of the seid beseecher, but yf he be remedyt by youre gracious lordship, hit lyke youre seid Lordship to sende by a serjunt of armes for the seid Moris, and his said coofees, now beyng yn London, to appere afore you yn the Kyngis Chaucery, at a day by yowe to be lymeted, and than there to be examynyd of all the matters forsaid, and thereupon to compelle tham to make a sufficiant and suere astat of all the seid manors and office to the said beseecher, and to the heirs of his body comynig, for the love of God, and yn the way of charite.

(3) Examination by the Bishop of Bath and Wells, Chancellor of England, of two persons to whom one Robert Crody had made a feignment by parol, on his death-bed, in trust for his wife for life, with remainder to his daughter in tail. (Cal.
vol. i. p. xliii.)

Be it hade in mynde that the x. day of August the reigne of Kyng Henry the syxt after the Conquest xvi, John Gover of Wyntenaye Herteley in the shire of Suthampton, husbondsman, and Thomas Attemore of the same toune, husbondsman, apperyng afore the right reverent Fader in Gode the Bishop of Bath and Welles Chaunceller of Ingeloud, in his manoir of Dogmersfeld, and ther examined severally upon a certein feignment made to thayme by one Robert Crody of certeyn londes and tenements in the toune afore especificd, sayde and confessyd ther expresslye by threm othes upon a boke howe that the saide Robert, the Wednesday nyxt after the fest of Seint Michell, the yere of the reigne of Kyngge Henry the fytte after the Conquest, viii, in the evenynge, leyng in an house of his awen atte the saide toune, so sore seke in his bede that for his seke-nesse he myght noght be remeved, in to so moche that in the same nyght followyng he died, callede to hym the forsaide John and Thomas, saynyng to thaym in this maner—"Sires ye be the men in whom I have grete trust afore moche other persones, and in especial that suche will als I shall declare you atte this tyme, for my full and last will, shall throug your gude help by oure Lordes mercy be perfourmed; Wherefore I lote you have full knowlich, that this house which I ly in, and all myn other CH. VI. londes and tenements in this toune, I yeve and graunte to you, to holde to you your heires and your assignes, to this entent, that after myn deces, ze shall make estate of the same house, londes and tenements to Alice my wyfe [for] terme of hir lyve, so that after hir deth thay remayne to Margarete my doghter, and to the heires of hir body loufully becomyng, and if sche die withoute heir of hir body comyng, that then they remayne to my right heires for evermore. And to thentent that this my last will mowe be performed by you, als my trust is that it shall be, her atte this tyme I delyver you possession of this house in the name of all my londes and tenements afore especified, als holy and entirely als they wer ever myn atte any tyme. By force wherof the foreside John and Thomas wer possessyd of the house, landes and tenements aforeside, in thaire demesene als of fee, and of the same house, londes and tenements made estate to the saide Alice, after the deth of hir saide husbond, accordyng to the entent and will afore declared.

(4) The following case is interesting, as showing an attempt made to obtain a recognition of uses as an integral part of the common law at the hands of the Common Law Courts, and the reasons why it was unsuccessful.

YEAR BOOK, 4 EDWARD IV, 8. 9. Translation.
In a writ of trespass quaere vi et armis clausum fugit, etc., et arboreus succidit, etc., et herbas conculcavit et consumpsit, etc.
Catesby. The plaintiff ought not to have his action, for we say that long before the supposed trespass one J. B. was seised in fee of certain land and died so seised, which then descended to the defendant as heir-at-law of the said J. B., being the place where the trespass is supposed to have been committed, and the defendant being seised in fee of the said lands enfeofled the plaintiff in fee, to the use of the defendant and upon confidence, and then the defendant by sufferance of the plaintiff and at his

1 A perfect livery of seisin. See above, Chap. III, § 12 (2).
2 This was the regular form of a writ of trespass (to lands) vi et armis, as opposed to a writ of trespass 'on the case.' The latter was an extension (by virtue of statute West. II, c. 24) of the writ of trespass, which was originally applicable only to violent injuries, to all cases of damage caused by misfeasance (commission of wrongful acts), or even by nonfeasance (omission of acts which a person is bound to do).
3 Counsel for defendant.
will occupied the land and cut the trees within the said land and depastured the herbage, which are the trespasses complained of in the action.

Jenney. That is no plea, for that is no certain matter—the sufferance of the plaintiff and that the defendant occupied by the will of the plaintiff—for such sufferance and will cannot be tried, for the intent of a man is uncertain, and a man should plead such matter as is or may be known to the jury, if the issue should be taken thereon. And this cannot be upon the alleged sufferance or will of the plaintiff that the defendant should occupy, etc.; and therefore in such a case to make a good issue or matter traversable, he should plead the lease made by the plaintiff to the defendant to hold at his will, which is matter traversable, and that may be tried.

Catesby. Wherefore should the defendant not avail himself of this matter, when it follows by reason that the defendant enfeoffed the plaintiff to the use of the defendant, and so that the plaintiff is only in the land to the use of the defendant, and the defendant made the feoffment to the plaintiff in trust and confidence? And the plaintiff suffered the defendant to occupy the land, so that by reason that the defendant occupied the land at his will, this proves that the defendant shall have the advantage of this feoffment in trust, in order to justify his occupation of the land by this cause, etc.

Moite. This is a good ground of defence in Chancery, for the defendant there shall aver the intent and purpose upon such a feoffment, for in the Chancery a man shall have remedy according to conscience upon the intent of such a feoffment, but here by the course of the common law in the Common Pleas or King’s Bench it is otherwise, for the feoffee shall have the land; and the feoffor shall not justify contrary to his own feoffment, that the said feoffment was made in confidence or the contrary.

Catesby. The law of Chancery is the common law of the land, and there the defendant shall have advantage of this matter and feoffment; wherefore then shall he not have it in the same manner here?

1 Counsel for plaintiff.
2 The Chancellor as an ecclesiastic could look into a man’s heart and conscience and see what his intent was; a jury could only pronounce upon matter ‘in pais,’ open notorious facts known to all the neighbours. See above, p. 286.
3 A judge.
Moyle. That cannot be so here in this court, as I have already said, for the common law of the land is different from the law of Chancery on this point.

Catesby passed over the point; and as to the trees he repeated the former plea, and said that he had no further answer. As to the herbage, he said that the plaintiff was seised in fee and leased the land to the defendant to hold at his will, etc.; wherefore the defendant entered and committed the alleged trespasses for which the action was brought.

Jenney traversed the lease, etc.

(5) The following cases show that though lands might be held to the use of a married woman, the Chancellor would not allow her to join with her husband in disposing of her interest during the coverture or marriage, but would treat any disposition made by the feoffee to uses at the joint request of the husband and wife as a breach of trust, for which the feoffee must answer. The principle upon which this rule was established is clearly stated in the cases below. On similar grounds it has become the established practice to protect the wife against imprudent dispositions of her property under the influence of the husband by inserting in the deed of settlement a provision that she is not during the coverture to make any alienation of her property by way of anticipation. Subject however to this restriction, a married woman had, prior to the 1st of January, 1883, the same absolute power of disposition over property held by trustees for her separate use as if she were unmarried; and now by the Married Women’s Property Act, 1882, the intervention of a trustee is no longer necessary, and a married woman is capable of acquiring, holding, and disposing by will or otherwise of any real or personal property as her separate property, in the same manner as if she were a feme sole.

1 By sect. 19 of the Married Women’s Property Act, 1882, the efficacy of a provision in restraint of anticipation is with certain limitations preserved.

2 45 46 Vict. c. 75, sect. 1 (1).
EXTRACTS FROM YEAR BOOKS.

YEAR BOOK, 7 EDWARD IV, 14. 8. Translation.

There was the following case in Chancery. A man was enfeoffed to the use of a woman, who took husband (baron). Husband and wife then sold the land to a stranger, for a certain sum of money, the wife received the money; and husband and wife then prayed the feoffee to the use of the wife to make an estate of this land to the stranger, and he enfeoffed the stranger. Afterwards the husband died, and the wife brings a subpoena against him who had been enfeoffed to her use, and he pleaded all the circumstances, and to this plea the plaintiff demurred. And the case was rehearsed in the Exchequer Chamber before the Chancellor and the Justices of both Benches.

Starkey (for the plaintiff). The plea is not sufficient, for what was done by the wife was void, for if she had been seised of the land, and the husband and the wife had made a feoffment thereof, after the husband's death she would have had a 'cui in vita,' for that the feoffment made by the wife during the coverture is void, and so here in conscience this sale made by husband and wife was entirely the act of the husband, and not of the wife, etc. Ad quod tota curia concessit, etc. And the Chancellor said that the wife non potest consentire during the coverture, if it be through dread or coercion (that she did it), that cannot be said to be consent, and everything that a married woman does shall be said to be done through dread of her husband, and that they would pay no regard to the fact of her having received the money, because she could have had no advantage of it, but only the husband, etc. The Chancellor said to Starkey, 'What do you pray?'

[Starkey.] We pray that the defendant should be committed to prison until he have satisfied us concerning the land, etc.

The Chancellor. You can have a subpoena against the vendee who is in possession of the land, and recover the land against him.

1 That is, she admitted the plea to be true in fact, but alleged that the facts therein stated, though true, did not in point of law amount to a valid answer to her claim.

2 This was the remedy by which the wife might recover after the husband's death her lands in the hands of a feoffee to whom the husband had granted them with the assent of the wife, although she had herself been a party to the feoffment. See the form of the writ in the next case.

3 It was the interference of the Chancellor with the 'franc tenement' which made the Commons so jealous of his jurisdiction in the earlier stages of its growth. See Spence, Equitable Jurisdiction, i. p. 344.
CH. VI. Yeaverton. If he knew of the deceit and wrong done to the woman, then the subpoena lies against him, otherwise not.

The Chancellor. He knew that the woman was a feme covert.

Starkey. We pray that the defendant be committed to prison, and as to the subpoena against the other we wish to be advised.

YEAR BOOK, 18 EDWARD IV, ii. 4. Translation.

There was the following case in the Chancery. A feme sole made a feoffment in confidence (to her own use), and then took husband, and during the coverture (she dying in her husband’s lifetime) she declared her will that her feoffees should make an estate to her husband, to him and his heirs for ever, and after her death her husband sued a subpoena. The question was whether this will was good or not.

Tremaylor. It seems that the will is good, and that the feoffees will be compelled to make an estate according to the will. For just as the wife can make executors with the agreement of her husband, so can she declare her will by the agreement of her husband that the feoffees should make an estate to the husband, and conscience will see that it should be done.

Vassior. There is a great difference between your case and this case, for there are divers cases in which by agreement with her husband the wife may make executors, as if a bond be made to a woman before her marriage, during the coverture by agreement with her husband she can make executors, and in that case the executors shall have an action of debt on the bond, because the husband cannot in any wise have an action upon it after the death of the wife, for his interest is determined by her death; so as to her apparel, which is called in our law paraphernalia, of this by agreement with her husband she can make a will, and that would be good, and they are the goods of the husband, but in the present case the law is otherwise, for the law will not suffer anything done by her during the coverture to be good, and if during the coverture she makes a feoffment of her land, it is void, and this proves well that nothing done by her during the coverture is good concerning any inheritance, for the writ 'cui in vita' runs, 'cui ipsa in vita sua contradicere non potuit,' and so this proves well that her act and her will is void during the coverture, etc.

1 As a general rule, prior to the Married Women’s Property Act, 1882, a married woman could make no valid will. Her husband might however assent to her disposing of her personal property by will thereby waiving his right to take out administration to her property, and effect would then be given to the dispositions of her will. This however could only extend to those rights of the wife which had not become vested in the husband in his marital right: these (before the Married Women’s Property Act, 1870) were confined to ‘chooses in action not reduced into possession,’ e.g. a debt due but not paid, and paraphernalia. As to the complete powers of disposition by will or otherwise now given by the Married Women’s Property Act, 1882, see above, p. 296.

Jaye ad idem. If this will be good, the inheritance of the wife during the coverture will not be safe from alienation by the husband, for the feoffment made before the coverture is to that intent that the alienation of the husband should be ineffectual, and thus if the will should be effectual, that would be prejudicial to the heir (of the woman), quod Sulbard concessit.

The Chancellor. The will cannot be good, for she cannot acquire or lose land during the coverture without her husband, and seeing that she cannot do that at the common law, and that any act done by her is merely void, the law of conscience says also that her will should be so (void) and ineffectual.

Tremaile. A fine levied by husband and wife is good.

Vвисor. The reason is that she shall be examined in open court by the justices, and her intent is proved by matter of record.

But the opinion of all those at that time, except Tremaile, was that the will was void.

1 See p. 297, n. 2.
CHAPTER VII.

THE STATUTE OF USES AND ITS PRINCIPAL EFFECTS ON MODERN CONVEYANCING.

CH. VII. In the last chapter the early history of uses of lands has been traced in outline. It has been seen that, originating simply in a moral or religious obligation, a use of lands became a recognised collection of rights and duties, incumbent upon and enjoyed by the legal owner and the beneficiary respectively, and capable of being asserted and enforced by the proper tribunal. In reviewing the subsequent history of uses it must be borne in mind that the tendency of philosophical thought prevailing at the period in question was to invest all abstract ideas with a real and substantial existence, to treat of them not merely as collective names for a variety of particular facts and circumstances agreeing in the points designated by the general name, but as having a real existence, apart from the particular or individual instances, and possessing definite attributes or properties necessarily inherent in their essence. These realist notions will be found to have exercised an important and pernicious influence upon the development of the law of land, and this influence is most conspicuous in the history of uses. A use is now regarded as an abstract entity, possessing certain qualities of its own, which naturally flow from it or are inherent in it. Thus the development of the law is frequently the result of a discussion as to what these essential qualities of a use are, and when they are supposed to be ascertained by reasoning, they are made the basis of judicial decision, all other considerations, such as expediency, or conformity to general principles of law, being thrown into the background. It must be confessed that the handling of 'uses' by the common lawyers contrasts unfavourably with the enlightened system which had been constructed by the succession of ecclesiastical chancellors.

§ 1. The Statute of Uses, 27 Henry VIII, c. 10.

Before the passing of the Statute of Uses in the twenty-seventh year of Henry VIII, attempts had been made to protect by legislation the interests of creditors, of the king, and of the lords, which were affected injuriously by feoffments to uses. It has already been seen that the legislature at a very early date interfered in the interest of creditors to render uses liable to be taken in execution for debt. By 1 Richard III, c. 1, the conveyances of cestui que use were made good without assent of the feoffees; and by 4 Henry

1 See above, p. 274.
2 This statute, after reciting 'that by privy and unknown feoffments great unsecury, trouble, costs and grievous vexations do daily grow betwixt the king's subjects, insomuch that no man that buyeth lands, tenements, rents, services, or other hereditaments, nor women which have jointure or dower in any lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, nor the last will of men to be performed, nor leases for term of life or of years, nor annuities granted to any person or persons for their services for term of their lives or otherwise, be in perfect surety, nor without great trouble and doubt of the same by reason of such privy and unknown feoffments,' enacts 'that every estate, feoffment, gift, release, grant, leases, and confirmations of lands, tenements, rents, services, or other hereditaments, made or had, or hereafter to be made or had, by any person or persons being of full age, of whole memory, at large and not in dures, to any person or persons, and all recoveries and executions had or made, shall be good and effectual to him to whom it is so made, had or given, and to all other to his use, against the seller, feoffor, donor, or grantor of the same, and against the sellers, feoffors, donors, or grantors, and his and their heirs claiming the same only as heir or heirs to the same sellers, feoffors, donors, or grantors, and every of them, and against all other having or
CH. VII. VII, c. 17, the lord was given the wardship of the heir.

§ 1. The tendency of these and similar enactments was to assimilate in some particulars the position of cestui que use to that of legal owner, to throw upon him some at all events of the burdens and liabilities attaching to the legal ownership. What imperfect success attended these attempts appears from the preamble of the Statute of Uses. The object of that Statute was by joining the possession or seisin to the use and interest (or, in other words, by providing that all the estate which would by the common law have passed to the grantee to uses should instantly be taken out of him and vested in cestui que use), to annihilate altogether the distinction between the legal and beneficial ownership, to make the ostensible tenant in every case also the legal tenant, liable to his lord for feudal dues and services,—wardship, marriage, and the rest. As will be pointed out in the next chapter, by converting the use into the legal interest the Statute did away with the power of disposing of interests in lands by will, which had been one of the most important results of the introduction of uses. Probably these were the chief results aimed at by the Statute of Uses.

A strange combination of circumstances—the force of usage by which practices had arisen too strong even for legislation to do away with¹, coupled with an almost superstitious claiming any title or interest in the same only to the use of the same seller, feoffor, donor, or grantor, or sellers, donors, or grantors, or his or their said heirs, at the time of the bargain, sale, covenant, gift, or grant made, saving to every person or persons such right, title, action, or interest by reason of any gift in tail thereof made, as they ought to have had if this Act had not been made.'

¹ The invasion of 'the old accustomed law in many things,' especially the interference with the practice of disposing of lands by will, was one of the grievances which led to the insurrection of 1535. 'Masters, there is a statute made whereby all persons be restrained to make their will upon their lands; for now the eldest son must have all his father's lands, and no person, to the payment of his debts, neither to the advancement of his daughters' marriages, can do nothing with their lands, nor cannot give to his youngest son any lands.' Speech of Mr. Sheriff Dymock at Horncastle, quoted from Roll House MS. A. 2, 29, in Froude's History of England, III. 91.
adherence on the part of the courts to the letter of the Statute—produced the curious result, that the effect of the Statute of Uses was directly the reverse of its purpose, that by means of it secret conveyances of the legal estate were introduced, while by a strained interpretation of its terms the old distinction between beneficial or equitable and legal ownership was revived. What may be called the modern law of Real Property and the highly technical and intricate system of conveyancing which still prevails, dates from the legislation of Henry VIII.

27 Henry VIII, cap. 10. An Act concerning Uses and Wills.

Whereby the common laws of this realm, lands, tenements, and hereditaments be not devisable by testament, nor ought to be transferred from one to another, but by solemn livery and seizin, matter of record\(^1\), writing sufficient made bona fide, without covin or fraud, yet nevertheless divers and sundry imaginations, subtle inventions, and practices have been used, whereby the hereditaments of this realm have been conveyed from one to another by fraudulent feeffments, fines, recoveries, and other assurances craftily made to secret uses, intents, and trusts, and also by wills and testaments, sometimes made by nuda parola and words, sometimes by signs and tokens, and sometimes by writing, and for the most part made by such persons as be visited with sickness, in their extreme aginies and pains, or at such time as they have had scantily any good memory or remembrance; at which times they being provoked by greedy and covetous persons lying in wait about them, do many times dispose indiscreetly and unadvisedly their lands and inheritances; by reason whereof, and by occasion of which fraudulent feeffments, fines, recoveries, and other like assurances to uses, confidences, and trusts, divers and many heirs have been unjustly at sundry times disherited, the lords have lost their wards, marriages, reliefs, harriots, escheats, aids, pur fair fitz chivalier and pur filo marier, and scantily any person can be certainly assured of any lands by them purchased, nor know surely against whom they shall use their actions or execution for their rights,

\(^1\) That is, by process in a court of record, e.g. by fine or recovery.
304

USES.

CH. VII. titles, and duties; also men married have lost their tenancies by § 1. the curtesy, women their dowers; manifest perjuries by trial of such secret wills and uses have been committed; the king’s highness hath lost the profits and advantages of the lands of persons attainted, and of the lands craftily put in feoffment to the uses of aliens born, and also the profits of waste for a year and a day of lands of felons attainted, and the lords their echeats thereof; and many other inconveniences have happened, and daily do increase among the king’s subjects, to their great trouble and inquietness, and to the utter subversion of the ancient common laws of this realm; for the extirping and extinguishment of all such subtle practised feoffments, fines, recoveries, abuses, and errors heretofore used and accustomed in this realm, to the subversion of the good and ancient laws of the same, and to the intent that the king’s highness or any other his subjects of this realm, shall not in any wise hereafter, by any means or inventions be deceived, damaged, or hurt, by reason of such trusts, uses, or confidences: It may please the King’s most royal Majesty, that it may be enacted by his Highness, by the assent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, in manner and form following: that is to say, that where any person or persons stand, or be seised, or at any time hereafter shall happen to be seised of and in any honours, castles, manors, lands, tenements, rents, services, reversions, remainders, or other hereditaments, to the use, confidence, or trust of any other person or persons, or of any body

1 In order to bring this statute into operation, one person must be seised to the use of another. Hence the first grantee must have an estate of freehold, e.g. the land must be conveyed by feoffment or otherwise to A in fee, or in tail, or for life, to the use of B. This executor the use in B, and B takes the estate limited to him by virtue of the statute, everything which would have been given to A by operation of the common law being instantly taken out of him and vested in B. On the other hand, if lands are given to A for ten years, or for any estate less than freehold, to the use of B, A is not seised to the use of B, i.e. he has not the possession as of freehold, consequently the statute does not operate, and A retains the legal interest in the term. For the same reason the words of the statute have no reference to copyhold estates.

2 Though the word that is most frequently employed to designate the beneficial interest is ‘use’—e.g. feoffment to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs—any words expressing the same intention are sufficient to raise a ‘use.’ In practice however, since the revival of the jurisdiction of the politick⁴, by reason of any bargain, sale, feoffment, fine, recovery, covenant, contract, agreement, will, or otherwise, by any manner means whatsoever it be; that in every such case, all and every such person and persons, and bodies politic, that have or hereafter shall have any such use, confidence, or trust, in fee simple, fee tail, for term of life, or for years, or otherwise; or any use, confidence, or trust, in remainder⁵ or reverter, shall from henceforth stand and be seised, deemed, and adjudged in lawful seisin, estate, and possession of and in the same honours, castles, manors, lands, tenements, rents, services, reversions, remainders, and hereditaments, with their appurtenances, to all intents, constructions, and purposes in the law, of and in such like estates, as they had or shall have in use, trust, or confidence of or in the same; and that the estate, title, right, and possession that was in such person or persons that were or hereafter shall be seised of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to the use, confidence, or trust of any such person or persons, or of any body politic, be from henceforth clearly deemed and adjudged to be in him or them that have, or hereafter shall have such use, confidence, or trust, after such quality, manner, form, and condition as they had before, in or to the use, confidence, or trust that was in them⁶.

Court of Chancery as explained below, the word use is commonly applied to a different species of interest to that designated by trust.

⁴ One person must be seised to the use of another, so if lands are conveyed to A and B and their heirs to the use of A and B and their heirs, there is here no person seised to the use of another, and consequently the conveyance does not operate under the statute, but has its effect at common law. It is otherwise if there is any substantial difference between the persons to whom the common law of seisin is given and the cestuis que use, e.g. if lands are given to A and B and their heirs to the use of A, B, and C and their heirs. Here the statute operates.

⁵ Therefore remainders can be created by way of use as well as at common law; e.g. feoffment to A and his heirs to the use of B for life, remainder to the use of C in tail, remainder to the use of D in fee. See Table III in Appendix to Part I.

⁶ The statute contains a double provision, (1) that the interest of cestui que use shall be turned into an actual possession or legal seisin (thus, if lands are given to A and his heirs to the use of B for life, or to the use of C for ten years, by virtue of this provision B is seised of a freehold estate for life and C is possessed of a term of ten years); (2) that the common law seisin shall be taken out of the grantees or feoffees and vested in cestui que use. Hence it follows that the estate limited to cestui que use must not be larger than that given to the grantee or feoffee to use: e.g. a grant to A to the use of B and his heirs would only give B a life estate. Therefore a seisin should
2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that where divers and many persons be or hereafter shall happen to be jointly seised of and in any lands, tenements, rents, reversions, remainders, or other hereditaments, to the use, confidence, or trust of any of them that be so jointly seised, that in every such case that or those persons or persons which have or hereafter shall have any such use, confidence, or trust, in any such lands, tenements, rents, reversions, remainders, or hereditaments, shall from henceforth have and be deemed and adjudged to have, only to him or them that have, or hereafter shall have, such use, confidence, or trust, such estate, possession, and seizin of and in the same lands, tenements, rents, reversions, remainders, and other hereditaments, in like nature, manner, form, condition, and course, as he or they had before in the use, confidence, or trust of the same lands, tenements, or hereditaments...

3. And where also divers persons stand and be seised of and in any lands, tenements, or hereditaments in fee-simple or otherwise, to the use or intent that some other person or persons shall have and perceive yearly to them and to his or their heirs one annual rent of x. li. or more or less out of the same lands and tenements, and some other person one other annual rent to him and his assigns for term of life, or years, or for some other special time, according to such intent and use as hath been heretofore declared, limited, and made thereof: Be it therefore enacted by the authority aforesaid, that in every such case the same persons, their heirs, and assigns, that have such use and interest to have and perceive any such annual rents out of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, that they and every of them, their heirs and assigns be adjudged and deemed to be in possession and seizin of the same rent of and in such like estate as they had in the title, interest, or use of the said rent or profit, and as if a sufficient grant or other lawful conveyance had been made and executed to them by such as were or shall be seised to the use or intent of any such rent to be had, always be created 'coextensive with the uses which are intended to be raised.' (Sugden's Gilbert on Uses, p. 127.) In practice, an estate in fee simple is always limited to the common law grantees.

1 e.g. when there has been a feoffment to A, B, and C and their heirs to the use of A and his heirs.

2 That is, where lands are vested by feoffment or otherwise in A and his heirs to the use and intent that B and his heirs for ever shall receive a rent (see above, p. 194, n. 2) issuing out of those lands.
made, or paid according to the very trust and intent thereof, and that all and every such person and persons as have or hereafter shall have any title, use, and interest, in or to any such rent or profit shall lawfully restrain for non-payment of the said rent, and in their own names make avowries, or by their bailiffs or servants make cognisances and justifications, and have all other suits, entries, and remedies, for such rents as if the same rents had been actually and really granted to them with sufficient clauses of distress, re-entry, or otherwise, according to such conditions, pains, or other things limited and appointed upon the trust and intent for payment or surety of such rent.

4. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that whereas divers persons have purchased, or have estate made and conveyed of and in divers lands, tenements, and hereditaments, unto them and to their wives and to the heirs of the husband, or to the husband and to the wife, and to the heirs of their two bodies begotten, or to the heirs of one of their bodies begotten, or to the husband and to the wife, for term of their lives, or for term of life of the said wife, or where any such estate or purchase of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, hath been or hereafter shall be made to any husband and to his wife, in manner and form expressed, or to any other person or persons, and to their heirs and assigns, to the use and behoof of the said husband and wife, or to the use of the wife, as is before rehearsed, for the jointer of the wife, that then in every such case every woman married having such jointer made or hereafter to be made

---

1 The effect of this provision is to vest the rent in cestui que use (B, last note), and consequently all the legal remedies for the rent are also vested in him, to the same extent as if he had received a direct grant of the rent operative at common law. The limitation of a rent in the first instance to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs is not touched by this section, which deals only with the case of a person being seised of lands to the use that another may receive a rent. Rent, however, is a ‘tenement’ within the first section, and therefore by a grant of a rent by deed to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs a use of the rent is executed in B, and all the legal remedies which he would have had by a direct grant at common law are vested in him. A rent, as has already been said, is regarded as a freehold interest, and the proper remedy for its recovery, before the abolition of real actions, was by assize of novel disseisin.

2 When a person whose goods have been distrained seeks to replevy them (i.e. recover by an action of repluvium), and the defendant justifies this taking of the goods, he is said to make avowry if he justifies in his own right (e.g. under a distress for rent in arrear due to him), and to make cognisance if he justifies in the right of another.
shall not claim nor have title to have any dower of the residue of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, that at any time were her said husband's, by whom she hath any such jointer, nor shall demand nor claim her dower of and against them that have the lands and inheritances of her said husband, but if she have no such jointer, then she shall be admitted and enabled to pursue, have, and demand her dower by writ of dower after the due course and order of the common laws of this realm, this act or any law or provision made to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

5. Provided always that if any such woman be lawfully expelled or evicted from her said jointer, or from any part thereof, without any fraud or covin, by lawful entry, action, or by discontinuance of her husband, then every such woman shall be endowed of as much of the residue of her husband's tenements or hereditaments, whereof she was before dowlable, as the same lands and tenements so evicted and expelled shall amount or extend unto.

7. Provided also, that if any wife have or hereafter shall have any manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments unto her given and assured after marriage for term of her life or otherwise in jointer, except the same assurance be to her made by act of parliament, and the said wife after that fortune to overlive her said husband, in whose time the said jointer was made or assured unto her, that then the same wife so overliving shall and may at her liberty after the death of her said husband, refuse to have and take the lands and tenements so to her given, appointed, or assured during the coverture, for term of her life, or otherwise in jointer, except the same assurance be to her made by act of

1 The effect of the grant of lands to the use of a man and his wife has been already noticed. See above, p. 287. It will be seen from this passage that the original meaning of 'jounture' is a joint estate given by way of use to husband and wife jointly. In common acceptance, however, it extends to a sole estate, and is defined by Sir Edward Coke to be 'a competent livelihood of freehold for the wife of lands and tenements to take effect in profit or possession presently after the death of the husband for the life of the wife at least.' (Coke upon Littleton, 36 b.) Before this statute the widow would not have been endowed of the lands of which the husband only had the use. The conversion of his beneficial interest into the legal estate amongst other legal incidents caused the right of the widow's dower to attach, and thus the wife who had been provided for by means of a jounture would, but for this provision, have derived an additional benefit from the statute which had not been contemplated. It was therefore provided that a jounture properly created before marriage should be a bar to dower; and thus the law remains at the present day.
parliament, as is aforesaid, and thereupon to have, ask, demand, and take her dower by writ of dower, or otherwise, according to the common law, of and in all such lands, tenements, and hereditaments, as her husband was and stood seised of any state of inheritance at any time during the coverture; anything contained in this act to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding.

9. And forasmuch as great ambiguities and doubts may arise of the validity and invalidity of wills heretofore made of any lands, tenements, and hereditaments to the great trouble of the King's subjects, the King's most royal Majesty minding the tranquillity and rest of his loving subjects, of his most excellent and accustomed goodness is pleased and contented that it be enacted, by the authority of this present parliament, that all manner true and just wills and testaments heretofore made by any person or persons deceased, or that shall decease before the first day of May that shall be in the year of our Lord God 1536, of any lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, shall be taken and accepted good and effectual in the law, after such fashion, manner, and form, as they were commonly taken and used at any time within forty years next before the making of this act, anything contained in this act, or in the preamble thereof, or any opinion of the common law to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

10. Provided always, that the King's Highness shall not have, demand, or take any advantage or profit for or by occasion of the executing of any estate only by authority of this act to any person or persons or bodies politic, which now have or on this side the said first day of May which shall be in the year of our Lord God 1536, shall have any use or uses, trusts, or confidences in any manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments holden of the King's Highness by reason of primer seisin, livery, ouster-le-main, fine for alienation, relief, or harriot, but that fines for alienation, reliefs, and harriots shall be paid to the King's Highness, and also liveries, and ouster-le-mains shall be sued for uses, trusts, and confidences, to be made and executed in possession by authority of this act, after and from the said first day of May, of lands, and tenements, and other hereditaments holden of the King in such like manner and form, to all intents, constructions, and purposes as hath heretofore been used or accustomed by the order of the laws of this realm.

15. Provided also, that this act nor anything therein contained, shall not be prejudicial to the King's Highness for wardships of

---

1 See Chap. VIII.
heirs now being within age, nor for liveries, or for ouster-le-mains, to be sued by any person or persons now being within age, or of full age, of any lands or tenements unto the same heir or heirs now already descended; anything in this act contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

§ 2. Effect of the Statute of Uses upon the power of dealing with the Legal Estate in Lands.

The Statute of Uses at once produced important effects upon the old modes of conveying the legal estate in lands. It has been already seen what were the appropriate modes of conveying freehold estates at common law. If the freehold was to pass immediately from the grantor to the grantee, feoffment with livery of seisin was the only appropriate mode. In practice the same result was accomplished by the fictitious processes of fines and recoveries. It has also been seen under what circumstances the Chancellor would before the Statute have held that the party taking by the common law conveyance would hold to the use, not of himself, but of the grantee or some other person. Wherever, with certain exceptions to be hereafter noticed1, such a construction would before the Statute have been put upon the conveyance by the Chancellor—wherever a use would have been raised in favour of some person other than the feoffee or grantee at common law, by reason either of an express declaration of the use, or of circumstances from which the intention of raising the use would necessarily have been inferred, in all such cases after the Statute the legal estate passed to the person in whose favour the use was declared or implied.

Thus if a feoffment, a fine, or a recovery was made, levied, or suffered to A and his heirs to the use of B for ten years, and subject thereto to the use of C for life, and after C’s decease to the use of D in tail, with remainder to the use of E in fee, the various estates would take effect by virtue of the 1 Active trusts, trusts of leasehold interests, and uses upon uses. See below, § 4.

EFFECT OF THE STATUTE OF USES.

Statute according to the several limitations, just as if a valid conveyance of them had been made operating at common law. The livery of seisin necessary to pass the freehold by feoffment need only have been made to A, the Statute is then called into operation, and is powerful enough, without anything further, to take the property from A and to vest it in the various persons according to their specified interests.

In the same way, if a feoffment was made by A to B and his heirs without consideration, the use would before the Statute, as has been before seen, have been held to come back to A. The Statute 'executes' this use, and the legal as well as the beneficial interest results, or comes back to the feoffor.

The distinction made in the text-books between the raising of a use by a conveyance operating by transmutation of possession, and raising a use without transmutation of possession, has already been noticed. In the former case a mode of conveyance is employed sufficient at common law to take the estate out of the donor and to vest it in the donee. To this conveyance is superadded, either by express words or by necessary implication, the obligation upon the donee to hold to the use of the donor or of some third person, or of the donor together with some third person.

Instances of dispositions of land of this kind would be, feoffment by A to B to the use of C, conveyance by way of fine or recovery from A to B to the use of A and C, feoffment by A to B without consideration. In these cases no estate vests permanently in B. The common law seisin which is given to him serves only to bring the Statute into operation. In the first of the above cases the legal estate vests at once in C, in the second in A and C jointly, in the last it results at once or comes back to A.

Uses are raised without transmutation of possession when the legal owner of lands binds himself to hold the lands for the use of some other person. It has already been seen that the usual mode of effecting this before the Statute was by bargain and sale, or covenant to stand seised. In these cases the use, which before the Statute was raised in favour of the covenantee or bargainee, is now executed by the Statute, and thus these two assurances take their places as modes of conveying the legal interest in lands. Thus A covenants to stand seised for B his eldest son and his heirs, or in consideration of £100 bargains and sells his lands to C and his heirs. B and C by force of the Statute take an estate in fee simple in precisely the same way as if that estate had been conveyed to them respectively by feoffment at common law.

\footnote{See above, p. 284.}

It will be easily seen that the Statute at once enabled a tenant in fee simple to deal with his lands in ways which would have been impossible at common law. For instance, at common law a man cannot convey to himself any interest in lands. Thus, suppose A and B are jointly seised of lands as trustees, and A dies, whereby the whole estate vests in B, and it is desired to appoint C a new trustee, and to vest the lands in B and C jointly. Before the Statute it would have been necessary for B to make a feoffment with livery to D and his heirs, so that D might make a feoffment with livery to B and C and their heirs; after the Statute the same object might be effected by one conveyance, namely, to D and his heirs to the use of B and C and their heirs. This is the ordinary mode of vesting trust-estates in a new trustee.

So by bringing the Statute into operation a man may convey a legal estate to his wife, which is impossible at common law.

1 See above, p. 285.
2 As to trustees see below, § 4.
3 As to joint tenants see above, Chap. V, § 4. Observe that a simple conveyance of a moiety by B to C would make B and C tenants in common and not joint tenants, a kind of interest much less suitable to the position of trustees, as each trustee would in that case have a separate inheritance which would devolve on his own representatives.
4 Sugden's Gilbert on Uses, p. 150.
One of the immediate effects of the Statute was, as has been seen, to give legal validity and effect to ‘bargains and sales.’ These transactions required no particular ceremony, no open or notorious act, such as livery of seizin; and thus one of the great objects of the Statute, the prevention of secret conveyances, would have been eluded. This was at once perceived by the legislature, and in the same year a second Act was passed intended to prevent the mischief of secret bargains and sales by providing for their enrolment in one of the superior courts or before the custos rotulorum of the county in which the lands were situate.\(^1\)

Another effect of the Statute of Uses was to introduce at once modes of dealing with the legal interest, in respect to the period and conditions of its commencement and termination, which were wholly unknown to the common law.

It has been shown in the sixth chapter that before the Statute the Chancellor was in the habit of enforcing uses created so as to arise at a future time. Such limitations now became effectual also at law, and conveyancers were thus enabled to introduce limitations of much greater complication, in dealing with the legal estate, than was possible at common law.

This will be best understood by examples. When once a conveyance is made effectual to give the common law seizin in fee to the grantees to uses, any number of uses may be created to arise in succession. In other words, interests may be given within certain limits (to be explained presently) to a greater number of persons, and to arise and come to an end on a greater variety of contingencies than was possible at the common law. For instance, a person in contemplation of the marriage of his eldest son wishes to settle lands upon him and upon the issue of the marriage. Accordingly \(A\), the settlor, conveys the lands to \(B\) and \(C\) and their heirs to the use of himself and his heirs until the intended marriage. \(A\) therefore takes back to himself an estate in fee simple until the marriage takes place, and if it does not take place at all, no actual change occurs in his rights of property over the land. The next limitation may be, after the marriage to the use of B and C (the trustees) for a term of 99 years upon certain trusts, e.g. to pay a sum for pin-money to the wife during the marriage. The next limitation may be, after the determination of the said term and in the meantime subject thereto and to the trusts thereof to the use of A the settlor for life. This would not be possible at the common law, for no estate could be limited after a fee simple, nor could a man convey any interest to himself; but as before the Statute there was nothing to prevent the trustees being bound to hold to a different trust upon the happening of a specified event, so there is nothing since the Statute to prevent the legal estate in fee simple changing on the happening of the specified event to a legal estate for life. Then after A's death to the use of his eldest son for life. This is a vested remainder, as explained in Chapter V. Then to the use of such son's eldest son in tail. This gives a contingent remainder to the eldest son, and is usually followed by similar remainders to other sons and other provisions, last of all by a remainder to the use of A and his heirs, or of the heirs of A for ever, which gives A an ultimate remainder in fee simple.

\(^1\) See below, § 3.

1 Prior to the Statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, (see above, p. 224,) which prevented the destruction of contingent remainders by alienation merger or forfeiture of the particular estate, it was usual to insert in setlements before the limitation of the contingent remainders, a vested remainder to the use of trustees during the life of the tenant of the particular estate upon trust to preserve the contingent remainders, and for that purpose to make any entries or bring any actions that might be necessary. This device is said to have been invented during the time of the Commonwealth by Sir Orlando Bridgeman and Sir Geoffrey Palmer. See Blackstone ii. p. 172.

2 It may be useful to compare the form of a marriage settlement of land given in Schedule IV of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41:—

This Indenture, made the day of 1882, between John M. of the 1st part, and Jane S. of the 2nd part, and X of and Y of the 3rd part, Witnesseth that in consideration of the intended marriage between John M. and Jane S. John M., as settlor hereby conveys to X and Y. All that &c. To hold to X and Y in A case is reported where a man bargained and sold in fee simple part of his estate and covenanted to give the bargainee the residue, and that if he (the bargainor) should 'go about to alien' the residue to another that then he would stand seised to the use of the bargainee in fee. The event subsequently happened, the bargainor did attempt to alien the residue to another, and it was held that the use thereupon arose in favour of the bargainee, and that the legal estate passed to him. So, although at common law a feoffment could not be made to take effect at a future time, a feoffment to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs at the death of J. S.—a living person—would be valid, and upon the death of J. S. the legal estate would vest in B, the use in the meantime resulting to A.

The above instances may suffice to suggest a distinction which is usually made between what are called (1) shifting uses, (2) springing uses, (3) future or contingent uses, or, more properly, uses limited to take effect as remainders.

The distinction between the first two of the above classes has in the history of the law been of less importance than the distinction between those two classes and the third.

fee simple to the use of John M. in fee simple until the marriage, and after the marriage to the use of John M. during his life without impeachment of waste with remainder after his death to the use that Jane S., if she survives him, may receive during the rest of her life a yearly jointure rentcharge of £ and subject to the before mentioned rentcharge to the use of X and Y for a term of five hundred years without impeachment of waste on the trusts hereinafter declared, and subject thereto to the use of the first and other sons of John M. and Jane S. successively according to seniority in tail male with remainder (insert here, if thought desirable, to the use of the same first and other sons successively according to seniority in tail with remainder) to the use of all the daughters of John M. and Jane S. in equal shares as tenants in common in tail with cross remainders between them in tail with remainder to the use of John M. in fee simple (Insert trusts of term of 500 years for raising portions, &c.)

In witness, &c.

The expressions 'in fee,' 'in tail' are by the Act (sect. 51) made sufficient without the use of the words 'heirs,' or 'heirs of the body.'

1 Sugden's Gilbert, p. 161. Rolle's Abridgment, p. 786. m, 40 and 41 Elizabeth.
CH. VII. § 2. A shifting use is where a use has been properly created, and then upon the happening of some specified event the interest first created passes away from the person enjoying it, and vests, partially or wholly, in some other person. For instance, if lands are given to $A$ and his heirs to the use of $B$ and his heirs, but if $B$ die in the lifetime of $A$ then to the use of $C$ and his heirs. Upon the death of $B$ in $A$'s lifetime the use is said to shift to $C$. Again, a provision is often made by way of the creation of a shifting use for an estate shifting away from the person to whom it is first given to some other member of the family on the acquisition of some other estate. Thus by the aid of shifting uses the old rules as to the creation of future estates by way of remainder may be evaded, a future freehold interest can now since the Statute be created by way of shifting use to take effect without waiting for the determination of a particular estate, and an estate in fee simple can by the same method be made to pass from one person to another. Nor can any alienation or disposition of the lands by the first $cestui que use$ affect the interest of the person who, upon the happening of the specified contingency, is entitled to the use of the lands.

Springing uses differ from shifting uses merely in the fact of their arising by virtue of the mode of their creation as new uses, and not operating by way of shifting of a use already created from one person to another. Thus the instance of a bargain and sale and covenant above given, and a feoffment to take effect in future, are instances of the creation of springing uses.

1 Shifting uses appear to have been introduced very soon after the passing of the Statute of Uses. Brooke's Abridgment, Feoffment al Uses, 320 b, no. 30, gives an instance in 6 Edward VI. The report concludes, 'Et ideo vide que homine al cest jour peut faire feoffment al use, et que l'use changera de un in alter par act ex post facto par circumstancie, si bien que il fera devant l'istantte 27 H. VIII. de uses.'

2 Compare Markby's Elements of Law, p. 155, note.

3 There is an instance of a springing use in Brooke's Abridgment, 331 b, 50, in 30 Henry VIII, three years after the passing of the Statute of Uses.

*If $A$ covenant with $B$ that when $A$ shall be enfeoffed by $B$ of 3 acres in $D$, Both shifting and springing uses are subject to the 'rule against perpetuity,' the history and nature of which will be noticed presently.

Future or contingent uses, or, as they might be called, uses limited as remainders, present somewhat different features, though the importance of the distinction is much diminished by the recent Act 40 and 41 Vict. c. 33. By a series of decisions a rule was established that if a limitation could be regarded as a remainder it should not be regarded as a springing or shifting use. Nor was this rule affected by the consideration that the use might be void if the stringent requirements which the common law demanded in the case of contingent remainders were not complied with. Thus if it unfortunately happened that the conveyancer in drawing the deed expressed the conditions on which the future use was to arise in such a way that the future estate could be construed as a remainder, and if, at the same time, such remainder was contrary to the old common law rules affecting remainders, which had long ceased to be founded on any substantial reason, the future interest from this defect in point of law was invalid. For instance, if a conveyance was made to \( B \) and his heirs to the use of \( A \) for 10 years, remainder to the use of the heirs of \( J. S. \), the remainder was void, being a contingent remainder limited upon an estate for years. The fact that if the limitation did not happen to fall within the definition of a remainder, it might be good as a springing use, was utterly disregarded. Perhaps in no point was the extreme that then the said \( A \) and his heirs and all others seized of the land of \( A \) in \( S. \), shall be seized of it to the use of the said \( B \) and his heirs, then if \( A \) make a feoffment of his land in \( S. \), and then \( B \) enfeof \( A \) of the said 3 acres of land in \( D. \), then the feoffee of \( A \) shall be seized to the use of \( B. \) notwithstanding that he had no notice of the use, for the land is and was bound by the aforesaid use, into whatsoever hands it might come, and it is not like the case where the feoffee to uses sells the land to one who has no notice of the first use, for in the first-mentioned case the use had no existence until the feoffment of the 3 acres was made, and then the use commenced.'

1 See Sugden's note to Gilbert on Uses, p. 172.
2 Ib., p. 165.
CH. VII. § 2.

technicality of the rules relating to uses, owing no doubt in part to the ideas spoken of at the commencement of this chapter, more conspicuous. A partial remedy for this injustice in the case of contingent remainders created by instruments executed after August 2, 1877 has been provided by the Statute 40 and 41 Vict. c. 33, by which it is provided that every contingent remainder . . . in tenements or hereditaments of any tenure which would have been valid as a springing or shifting use or executory devise or other limitation had it not had a sufficient estate to support it as a contingent remainder, shall, in the event of the particular estate determining before the contingent remainder vests, be capable of taking effect in all respects as if the contingent remainder had originally been created as a springing or shifting use or executory devise or other executory limitation 1.

One of the commonest modes of calling into operation the Statute of Uses is by the creation of what are called powers of appointment, that is, conferring on a person a power of disposing of an interest in lands quite irrespective of the fact whether or not he has any interest in the land himself. The creator or donor of the power in disposing of the lands makes a conveyance operative at common law, and at the same time declares that such and such uses are to arise on the execution of a proper instrument by a designated person. This is called technically giving to a person a power of appointment, and the instrument when executed operates as an appointment. The estate which passes under the power of appointment comes not from the donee of the power, but from the original settlor 2; the only difference between an interest thus created

1 It will be seen that the effect of the Statute is considerably narrowed by the words in italics.

2 This it is important to remember, as certain practical consequences follow. Amongst others, the amount of succession duty payable is often affected by the consideration whether the donee takes from the settlor who created the power, who may be a near relation, or from the person who has executed the power in his favour, who may be a stranger in blood.
and an immediate conveyance being, that instead of the uses being declared by the original settlor at the time of the conveyance of the legal estate, it is left to a third person to declare them.

Thus it was common in ordinary purchase deeds of land, where the purchaser was married before Jan. 1, 1834, 1 to introduce provisions of this kind in order to bar effectually any claim to dower on the part of his widow. No estate of inheritance in possession was given to the purchaser at all, but he was enabled to dispose of the lands for any estate during his life. This was effected by conveying the lands to A and his heirs to such uses etc. as B (the purchaser) should appoint, and in default of and until appointment to the use of B for life, remainder to the use of A and his heirs during the life of B, 2 remainder to the use of B and his heirs. Under these limitations B never had more than an estate for life in possession, and therefore his widow's dower could not attach. At the same time, by exercising the power of appointment he could in effect convey an estate in fee simple to any other person 3.

Powers of appointment are sometimes general, and may be exercised by the creation of any estate in favour of any one, including the donee of the power himself or his wife. Sometimes they are special, and can only be exercised by creating some particular kind of estate, or in favour of particular persons or classes of persons.

The forms prescribed in the instrument creating the power

---

1 When the Dower Act (3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 105) came into operation, by which a simpler method of barring dower was introduced.
2 A vested remainder which might by possibility take effect by the determination of B's life estate in his lifetime, and was therefore sufficient to keep apart B's life interest, and prevent it merging in the ultimate remainder in fee.
3 Sometimes a person has an estate in fee simple and also a general power of appointment. In this case he can convey either by exercising his power or conveying his estate in the ordinary way. In the former case the exercise of the power defeats and divests his own estate: in the latter case the conveyance of the estate extinguishes the power.
CH. VII. must be strictly observed, otherwise the power will not have § 2. been effectually executed. For instance, the power may be given to be exercised by deed, in which case a will purporting to exercise it would be inoperative, and vice versa 1.

When modes of creating future interests in lands by means of shifting and springing uses became common, a question of great importance presented itself for solution, as to the period within which interests by way of uses arising at a future time might be created. It is plain that unless some limit of time had been adopted, limitations might have been introduced into settlements by which estates might have been divested and created at remote periods, and thus in effect an unreasonable restraint on alienation of lands might be introduced.
And when, as will be explained in the next chapter, the power disposing of lands by will was made part of the general law of the land, and wills were regarded as resembling conveyances to uses rather than as instruments operating at common law, the same question arose still more frequently upon the effect of devises of future interests in land, or, as they were called, executory devises.

What limits then are imposed by law regulating the time within which future or executory interests in land created by instruments operating under the Statute of Uses or by will must take effect? It has already been seen that the creation of future estates by way of remainder is limited by the rule that an estate given to an unborn person for life cannot be followed by any estate given to any child of such unborn person 2. It followed from this that the great object of settlements of lands, the preserving them in the settlor's family, could be attained only to the extent of giving an estate tail to

---

1 For certain relaxations as to the strictness which the law requires to execution of powers, and as to the relief which in some cases may be obtained in Equity against defective execution of powers, see Williams, Real Property,
p. 312, etc.

2 See above, p. 223, and Williams on Real Property, pp. 286, 288. The rule is there traced to Sir Edward Coke's metaphysical distinction between a single or common and a double or remote possibility.
an unborn member of the family. But this estate, after the introduction of the practice of suffering recoveries, was always liable to be turned into a fee simple and alienated, so soon as the tenant in tail came of age. The result was that settlements operating by way of creating estates in remainder could not absolutely prevent the alienation of lands for a longer period than during a life or lives in being and twenty-one years after. To this must be added a few months in the event of tenant in tail being en ventre sa mere at the time of the dropping of the previous life estate.

Future estates created by way of executory devise and springing or shifting uses required the invention of other rules as to the period within which such interests must arise. The earlier cases tend to limit the creation of such estates by the rule that they can only take effect after a life in being. Next, this limit seems to have been extended to embrace the case of an infant taking under an executory devise or by way of future use; such limitations were upheld to the extent of allowing the vesting of the estate at the time of the infant attaining majority after the dropping of a life in being. Finally, in Cadell v. Palmer it was held that future interests might be created by way of executory devise or springing use to take effect twenty-one years after the dropping of a life or lives in being without reference to minority. Thus the power of a person having an estate in fee simple over his land has been to some extent extended by judicial legislation. Any attempt however, directly or indirectly, to evade the ‘rule against perpetuities’ by controlling the alienation of lands for a longer period than a life or lives in being and twenty-one years after is void. Thus if lands be granted to A and his

1 See the earlier cases quoted and commented upon in the argument of Sir E. Sugden in Cadell v. Palmer, 1 Clark and Finnelly, 372.
2 1 Clark and Finnelly, 372.
3 John Duke of Marlborough devised lands to trustees in trust for several persons for life, with remainders to their first and other sons in tail male successively, and directed the trustees upon the birth of every son of each tenant for life to revoke the uses before limited to their respective sons in heirs to the use of B and his heirs until failure of the issue of C, and upon such failure to D and his heirs, the last limitation would be void, because it might be that the failure of the issue of C would not happen, if at all, till a distant period.

§ 3. Statute of Enrolments.

The main provisions of the following Statute have been already referred to. A bargain and sale enrolled under its provisions is still a possible mode of conveying a freehold interest in lands.

An examination of the language of the Statute shows that its provisions only extend to prevent any estate of inheritance or freehold being created without the observance of the prescribed forms. The Statute therefore did not extend to the creation of a term of years to arise by way of bargain and sale out of an estate of freehold. If A, tenant in fee simple, bargained and sold his lands to B for ten years, there was no necessity for any enrolment, or even for any writing to evidence the transaction. The Statute of Uses at once operated upon the bargain and sale; one person, the bargainor, was seised to the use of another, the bargainee, and there was no necessity for enrolment, inasmuch as the bargain and sale did not purport to create an estate of inheritance or freehold.

After a time an ingenious conveyancer bethought him of availing himself of a bargain and sale as a secret mode of conveying freehold interests in lands, thus avoiding the necessity of any livery of seizin or of enrolment. It was after some doubt at length held by the Court of Wards that a tail male, and to limit the lands to such sons for their lives, with remainders to the respective sons of such sons in tail male. It was held by Lord Keeper Henley (1759) that the clause of revocation and resettlement was void, as tending to a perpetuity and being repugnant to the estate limited. 1 Eden's Reports, 404.

1 See above, p. 313.
2 See Foulkes on Equity, ii. p. 12.
3 In the 18th of James I. Lutwidge v. Mitton, Croke's Reports, James, 604.
bargain and sale for a term of years gave to the lessee by force of the words of the Statute of Uses 'possession' of his term as if he had actually entered on the land, at all events for the purpose of being capable of taking by a simple deed a release of the reversion. Thus if A, tenant in fee simple, bargained and sold the manor of Dale to B for a year, and the day after executed a release of the reversion in fee to B and his heirs, he would by the bargain and sale have immediately vested in him an estate for a year in possession. He would thereupon become capable of taking a release, and so soon as the release was executed, the smaller estate and the larger would coalesce and the term be 'merged' or sunk in the larger estate, whereupon B would become tenant in fee simple in possession. So popular did this conveyance become, that in ordinary cases it entirely superseded the feoffment, and bargain and sale enrolled, and became the general mode of conveying freeholds _inter eivos_ till the year 1841. In that year an act was passed 'for rendering a release as effectual for the conveyance of freehold estates as a lease and release by the same parties.' This Act was repealed in 1844 by the Act to simplify the Transfer of Property; and in 1845 the last-mentioned Act was in its turn repealed and superseded by the provisions of the Act to amend the Law of Real Property. The second section of this Act gives the power of creating and transferring a freehold estate in possession by a simple deed of grant. The effect of the Statute of Uses is however still preserved, and a grant to uses under the Act to amend the Law of Real Property operates in precisely the same way, and is subject to precisely the same rules as any of the other conveyances to uses above noticed. The form of the conveyance of land has been still further shortened and simplified by the Conveyancing Acts, 1881, 1882, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41, and 45 & 46 Vict. c. 39; but the principles of the law as affected by the previous statutes remain unaltered.

1 See above, p. 217.
2 See above, Chap. V. § 1.
3 4 and 5 Vict. c. 21.
4 7 and 8 Vict. c. 76.
5 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106.
CH. VII.  27 HENRY VIII, CAP. 16.

§ 3.  An Act concerning Enrolments of Bargains and Contracts of Lands and Tenements.

Be it enacted by the authority of this present parliament, that from the last day of July, which shall be in the year of our Lord God 1536, no manors, lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, shall pass, alter, or change from one to another, whereby any estate of inheritance or freehold shall be made or take effect in any person or persons, or any use thereof to be made, by reason only of any bargain and sale thereof, except the same bargain and sale be made by writing indented, sealed, and enrolled in one of the King's Courts of Record at Westminster, or else within the same county or counties where the same manors, lands, or tenements so bargained and sold lie or be, before the Custos Rotulorum and two Justices of the Peace, and the Clerk of the Peace of the same county or counties, or two of them at the least, whereof the Clerk of the Peace to be one; and the same enrolment to be had and made within six months next after the date of the same writings indented. . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . And that the Clerk of the Peace for the time being, within every such county, shall sufficiently enrol and engross in parchment the same deeds or writings indented as is aforesaid, and the rolls thereof at the end of every year shall deliver unto the said Custos Rotulorum of the same county for the time being, there to remain in the custody of the said Custos Rotulorum for the time being, amongst other records of every of the same counties where any such enrolment shall be so made, to the intent that every party that hath to do therewith may resort and see the effect and tenor of every such writing so enrolled.

§ 4.  Equitable Estates in Lands since the Statute of Uses.

The object of the framers of the Statute of Uses was undoubtedly to do away with the distinction between the legal estate and the beneficial interest in lands which had given rise to the mischiefs recited in the preamble of the Statute. The properties which before the Statute had gathered round

1 Observe that the case of a bargain and sale by A, tenant in fee simple, to the use of B for years, is not within the language of the statute.
the beneficial interest or use under the judicial legislation of the Chancellors now with some modification attached to the legal interest in land. The modifications which the legal interest in lands consequently underwent, the increased powers of disposition and control which the owner in fee acquired, have already been traced. But in some points the Statute fell short of what was required. The principle that a conscientious obligation unrecognised by the law might be enforced by the Chancellor was not affected by the Statute. If therefore there still were found cases of the creation of legal estates upon trust for certain purposes, which estates could not be executed or transferred from the common law grantee to the beneficiary by the force of the Statute, it would be still within the power of the Chancellor to decree that the conscientious obligations should be carried out.

This occurred principally in three cases\(^1\). In the first place an active duty might be imposed on the grantee of the land to do certain acts in reference to it for the benefit of somebody else. Land might be granted to \(A\) upon trust to collect and pay over the rents to \(B\). Here it would be evidently intended that \(A\) should be legal owner, but a conscientious obligation would bind him to carry out the trust upon which he had received the land. Where therefore an active duty was imposed on the common law grantee, the use or trust was not executed by the Statute, but it was left to be enforced by the Court of Chancery. It is not always in practice an easy

\(^1\) See Equity Cases Abridged, i. 383. \[\text{Notwithstanding this statute (27 Hen.VIII, c. 10) there are three ways of creating an use or a trust which still remains as at common law, and is a creature of the Courts of Equity, and subject only to their control and direction. 1st. Where a man seised in fee raises a term of years and limits it in trust for \(A\) etc., for this the statute cannot execute, the termor not being seised. 2ndly. Where lands are limited to the use of \(A\) in trust to permit \(B\) to receive the rents and profits, for the statute can only execute the first use. 3rdly. Where lands are limited to trustees to receive and pay over the rents and profits to such and such persons, for here the lands must remain in them to answer these purposes: and these points were agreed to. Trin. 1700.' Symson and Turner, per Curiam.\] matter to say when the trust which is imposed on the legal owner is in the nature of an active duty, or when it is a use, trust, or confidence executed by the Statute. If lands are conveyed to A upon trust to allow B to receive the profits, no active duty being imposed on A, this use is within the Statute and is executed, the legal estate vesting in B.

The second case was where a trust was declared upon a leasehold interest. It has already been seen that this case is not provided for by the Statute. If therefore a term of ten years be given to A in trust for B, the legal estate vests in A, and the trust could (before November 1, 1875) only be enforced by the Court of Chancery.

But the most important defect, to remedy which the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery was ultimately called into action, arose from the strange doctrine laid down in Tyrrell's case.

It has often been remarked that English law bears traces of the realist doctrines of the Schoolmen. To deal with the conception of a use of lands as if it were a real thing, and to draw practical conclusions, however inconvenient, from this abstract idea, seemed perfectly natural to the lawyers of the sixteenth century. Thus it was a matter of most serious consideration in what manner the use could be preserved so as to arise and take effect in the case of future contingent uses. For instance, in a conveyance to A and B and their heirs to the use of C and his heirs till the marriage of D, and afterwards to the use of D for life, remainder to the use of D's eldest son, etc., it was made a grave question whether any rational account could be given of the reason why these future uses took effect. The ability of the common law

1 This distinction was taken as early as the thirty-sixth year of Henry VIII.

2 Home fait feoffment in fee al son use pur term de vie et que puis son decease J. N. prendra les profits, ceo fait un use in J. N. Contrar. s'il dit que puis son mort ses feoffes prendront les profits et livreront eux al J. N.: ceo ne fait use in J. N, car il nad eux nisi par les mains les feoffes.' Brooke's Abridgment, Feoffment al Uses, 52.

3 See above, p. 304.
seisin to furnish forth the use had been exhausted, it had supplied the vested legal interest of $C$ to an extent coextensive with itself, but how was it to supply that of $D$ and of his unborn son besides? Who could be said to be seised to the use of $D$'s unborn son$^1$? It is impossible even to state these difficulties in language intelligible to us, so completely has the mode of thought which gave them birth passed away. But such was the spirit in which the Statute of Uses was construed.

Reasoning of a similar character led the lawyers to hold that, when once the statute had been called into operation, its powers were exhausted, and that, if a foellonment were made to $A$ and his heirs to the use of $B$ and his heirs to the use of $C$ and his heirs, it was impossible to give any effect to the limitation in favour of $C$. That 'a use could not be engendered of a use' seemed no doubt a natural and intelligible proposition to Saunders, Chief Justice$^2$. It is a specimen of a rule of law with the most important consequences springing not from any consideration of its relation to expediency or to the wants of the community, but from an exaggerated conception of the mysterious qualities possessed by 'a use of lands,' and the consequences which flowed from them.

Thus the doctrine arose that there could not be a use upon a use. If therefore $A$ bargained and sold to $B$ to the use of $C$, the second use was considered wholly void. No

---

$^1$ Hence the wonderful doctrine of scienti$a$ juris which required an act of Parliament (23 and 24 Vict. c. 38. s. 7) for its abolition. See Williams on Real Property, pp. 307, 308. A curious instance of the tenacity of metaphysical ideas may be seen in the wording of this section. The draughtsman found it necessary to say that the estate of cestui que use is to take effect 'by force of and by relation to the estate and seisin originally vested in the person seised to the use.' What meaning can be attached to these words?

$^2$ The limitations in the text are simply a mode of providing that upon a given event $D$ shall take the estate, that upon $D$'s death it shall go to his eldest son, and that neither $C$ nor $D$ shall prevent these dispositions taking effect by any alienation. The curious point is that these effects of the Statute of Uses are the result not of considerations of public policy influencing either the legislature or the tribunals, but of the supposed logical consequences of the metaphysical conception of a use.

$^3$ See below, p. 331.
consideration was paid to the obvious intention of the transaction, the consequence was supposed to follow from the nature of the use. Here then was a case for the interference of the Chancellor. It appears that by the time of Sir E. Coke, the uses upon uses which the common law courts refused to recognise were enforced in Chancery. Thus was restored the distinction between the equitable and the legal estate, which it had been the design of the Statute of Uses to abolish.

These second uses were thenceforth known under the name of trusts. If lands were conveyed to A and his heirs, to the use of B and his heirs, in trust for C and his heirs, B had the legal estate by force of the Statute of Uses. C's interest was wholly created and protected by the Court of Chancery.

So if lands are conveyed to A and his heirs to such uses as he shall appoint; and he appoints to B and his heirs to the use of C and his heirs, the legal estate is vested in B, and C's interest is equitable only. For all practical purposes C is the owner of the estate. He can call upon B to convey to him or his nominee; he can himself part with his interest to another person, for whom B will, upon notice given to him, be a trustee; C's estate will descend to his heir according to the rules of law.

Such is the origin of modern Trusts under which so large a portion of the land of the country is held. The student must accustom himself to the use and meaning of these technical terms. The legal estate is vested in the trustee, in trust for the cestui que trust, who has the equitable estate. Whenever the rules of law are applicable, trusts or equitable estates or interests follow those rules. Thus an equitable estate may be created in fee, in tail, for life, or for years; an equitable

---

1 See Foote v. Hookins in 11 James I (2 Bulstrode, p. 337), in the course of which case Coke says, 'If cestui que use desires the feoffes to make an estate over, and they so to do refuse, for this refusal an action upon the case lieth not, because for this he hath his proper remedy by a subpoena in the Chancery.' It seems that this could only apply to a use upon a use.
estate tail may be barred in the same way as a legal estate tail; it will descend ab intestato according to the rules regulating legal estates; future estates in remainder and executory interests can be created in the same way, and are subject to the rule against perpetuity\textsuperscript{1}; the husband of cestui que trust is entitled to an estate by the curtesy, and the widow (since 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 105) to dower.

Besides the creation of trusts of lands expressly by a declaration of the intent of the grantor, which, though complete in itself, is insufficient to convey the legal estate, there is also a large class of what are called implied trusts. This is too large a subject to be discussed here, and it must be sufficient to say that wherever, according to the principles which regulated the action of the Court of Chancery as it existed before Nov. 1, 1875, it would be inequitable from circumstances of fraud, mistake, or otherwise, for the legal owner of the land to be also the beneficial owner, the legal owner will be held to be a trustee for the person who is in equity entitled to the lands. Thus if a person has agreed to buy land, and has paid the purchase money without receiving a formal conveyance, the legal owner will be held to be a trustee for him.

The creation or assignment of trust estates must by the provisions of the Statute of Frauds\textsuperscript{2} be evidenced by writing, but no other solemnity is necessary. This provision however, does not apply to implied or resulting trusts\textsuperscript{3}. The same statute in effect rendered trust estates in the hands of the heir liable for the debts of cestui que trust\textsuperscript{4} to the same extent \textsuperscript{1} It should be observed that the rule that the freehold could not be in abeyance was not applicable to trust estates. There is therefore nothing to prevent a contingent equitable remainder being limited so as to take effect after a particular estate for years (see above, p. 223), nor was such a contingent remainder liable to be destroyed before the statute 8 and 9 Vict. c. 105, by the forfeiture, surrender, or merger of the particular estate. (See Williams on Real Property, p. 299; Fearne, p. 284; and above, p. 224).

\textsuperscript{2} 29 Car. II, c. 3. ss. 7, 9.

\textsuperscript{3} Sect. 8.

\textsuperscript{4} Sect. 10. See Williams on Real Property, p. 176; and above, p. 239.
CH. VII.
§ 4.

as the legal interest, and subsequent statutes have placed the equitable interest on the same footing as the legal in this respect.

Amongst the most important consequences of the introduction of this class of interests were the facilities thereby afforded for providing for married women. By law a married woman had, as the fiction went, during coverture no separate existence apart from her husband. During her life therefore her lands became her husband’s, though they reverted to her or her heir after the termination of the husband’s interest. But there was nothing to prevent the lands being conveyed to a trustee in trust for a married woman. The trustee in such a case would be bound to receive the rents and pay them to her, so that the lands would be free from the control of her husband. The Court of Chancery even went the length, in order effectually to protect the woman from losing her property, of allowing the validity in this case of a clause in the settlement restraining the power of the woman during the coverture to alienate her interest in the lands—an exception to the general rule of law.¹ Now by the Married Women’s Property Act of 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 75), the disability of married women to acquire hold and dispose of separate property in their own name has been abolished, and there is no longer any need for the interposition of a trustee, in the case of women married or acquiring property after 1882.

Such are the main features of this large and important branch of the law of real property. To go further into detail is beyond the scope of the present treatise.

TYRRELL’S CASE. Michaelmas Term, 4 and 5 Philip and Mary. In the Court of Wards. (Dyer’s Reports, 155 a.)

Jane Tyrrell, widow, for the sum of four hundred pounds paid by G. Tyrrell her son and heir apparent, by indenture enrolled in ¹ See Haynes, Outlines of Equity, p. 211. The clause restraining anticipation, as it is called, was first inserted at the suggestion of Lord Thurlow in a settlement of which he was trustee. This restraint is still effectual notwithstanding the Married Women’s Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75, s. 19).

TYRRELL'S CASE.

Chancery in the 4th year of Edward VI, bargained, sold, gave, granted, covenanted, and concluded to the said G. Tyrrell all her manors, lands, tenements, &c., to have and to hold the said &c. to the said G. T. and his heirs for ever 1, to the use of the said Jane during her life without impeachment of waste; and immediately after her decease to the use of the said G. T. and the heirs of his body lawfully begotten; and in default of such issue, to the use of the heirs of the said Jane for ever. Quaere well whether the limitation of those uses upon the habendum 2 are not void and impertinent, because an use cannot be springing, drawn, or reserved out of an use, as appears prima facie 1 And here it ought to be first an use transferred to the vendee before that any freehold or inheritance in the land can be vested in him by the inrollment &c. And this case has been doubted in the Common Pleas before now; i.e. quiere begem. But all the Judges of C. B. and Saunders, Chief Justice, thought that the limitation of uses above is void, &c.; for suppose the Statute of inrollments (cap. 16) had never been made, but only the Statute of Uses (cap. 10) in 27 Henry VIII, then the case above could not be, because an use cannot be engendered of an use.

GIRLAND v. SHARP. 37 Elizabeth. (Croke's Reports, Eliz. p. 382.)

Trespass 3. Upon demurrer 4 the case was that one infeoffed his two sons to the use of himself for life, and after to the use of them and their heirs, ad ultiam voluntatem suam perimpendam; and afterwards devised it to Sharp, the defendant, in fee; and whether Sharp hereby shall have the land or not was the question. Cavesty conceived that he should not; for an use cannot be limited upon an use; then when he limits it to the use of his two sons and their heirs, he cannot afterwards limit it to the uses of his last will. But the words ad performandum ultiam voluntatem, as to limit any uses thereby, are void words. And to that opinion Clemen agreed, but Fenner doubted thereof. Wherefore it was adjourned.

---

1 This conveyance would take effect by way of use under the statute, and thus a legal estate in fee simple would be given to G. T.
2 The habendum is the part of the deed which designates the estate for which the grantee is to hold, 'to have and to hold,' etc.
3 The action was for breaking and entering the plaintiff's land.
4 That is, the facts as stated upon the record or pleadings are admitted to be true, and the question is what is the legal result of the admitted facts.
CH. VII. NEVILL V. SAUNDERS. Mich. 1686. (1 Vernou's Reports, 415.)

§ 4. Lands were given by will to trustees and their heirs in trust for Anne the defendant's wife and her heirs, and that the trustees should from time to time pay and dispose of the rents and profits to the said Anne or to such person or persons as she by any writing under her hand, as well during coverture as being sole, should order or appoint the same, without the intermeddling of her husband, whom he willed should have no benefit or disposal thereof; and as to the inheritance of the premises in trust for such person or persons and for such estate or estates as the said Anne by any writing purporting to be her will, or other writing under her hand, should appoint; and for want of such appointment in trust for her and her heirs. The question was whether this was an use executed by the statute, or a bare trust for the wife, and the Court held it to be a trust only, and not an use executed by the statute.
CHAPTER VIII.

HISTORY OF THE LAW OF WILLS OF LAND.

It has been seen that one of the most marked effects of the growth of feudalism was the abolition, except in certain localities, of the practice of devising interests in lands by will\(^1\). Such a disposition would have defeated the most valuable rights of the lord—relief, wardship, and marriage. It was therefore wholly inconsistent with feudal theories. In a great many boroughs, and in gavelkind lands, local customs were sufficiently strong to preserve the ancient liberty of disposition by will, and cases relating to ‘burgages devisable’ are common in the Year Books.

It has also been seen how the practice of disposing of uses of land by will became prevalent under the protection and encouragement of the Chancellors. One of the earliest of the recorded cases on this branch of the law contains a disposition by will, or rather perhaps settlement, of the use of lands made in the 6th year of Richard II\(^2\). Except therefore in the case of burgages devisable, a devise, before the legislation presently to be noticed, was simply a declaration by the legal tenant of the uses to which his heir at his death should hold the lands, or of the uses to which he had conveyed the lands

\(^1\) See above, pp. 28, 88.

\(^2\) Rothanhale v. Wychingham, above, p. 281, n. 2.
CH. VIII. to fee simple (such conveyance having been expressed to be to the use of his will), or else a disposition of a use which had already been created in favour of himself.

In order therefore that the devisee of the use might enforce the disposition of the will, the aid of the Chancellor was called in. The Chancellor would compel, if necessary, the tenant of the legal estate to convey the land devised to cestui que use, the devisee.

It appears from the title and preamble of the Statute of Uses that one of its principal objects was to abolish the power of disposing of interests in lands by will, and thereby to restore to the king and the great lords the feudal dues which they could not claim if the estate of the heir were defeated by a devise.

The Statute of Uses contained a saving in favour of wills made before the first day of May, 1536, the year following that of the passing of the Statute. Between that time and July 20, 1540, the power of testation was, as regards freehold interests in lands, wholly abolished, except in the localities mentioned above. It may however be well believed that it was impossible for the legislature, arbitrary and thorough-going as it was, to maintain a restriction so opposed to the habits and practices which had prevailed throughout the country ever since Uses had been understood and protected by the Chancellor. Accordingly in the 32nd year of Henry VIII (1540), it was found necessary to restore a large measure of the power of devising interests in lands. The provisions of the Statute 32 Henry VIII, c. 1, are somewhat complicated; but the upshot of them is that power is given to every tenant in fee simple to dispose of all his lands held by socage tenure, and of two-thirds of his lands held by knight-service. Careful provision is made by this Statute for the saving of primer seisins, reliefs, and fines on alienation, in the case of socage lands, and of the rights of wardship over

---

1 Sect. 9.
2 See above, p. 303, n. 1.
3 So interpreted by 34 and 35 Henry VIII, cap. 5, sect. 3.
the third part of knight-service lands, in favour of the king CH. VIII.
or other lord.

When by the Act for the abolition of military tenures\(^1\) tenue by knight-service was converted into free and common socage, the power of devise granted by the Statutes of Henry VIII extended to the whole of the lands of which previously only two parts had been devisable.

No particular solemnity was required by the Statutes of Henry VIII for the execution of wills. The first Statute spoke of a will or testament in writing or other act lawfully executed in the testator's life. Consequently 'bare notes in the handwriting of another person were allowed to be good wills within the Statute\(^2\).' The law was altered by the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. II, c. 3), by which it was made a necessary condition of the validity of a will of lands that it should be signed by the testator, or by some other person in his presence, and be subscribed by three or four credible witnesses.

The law of wills of all property, whether real or personal, now rests on the provisions of the Wills Act, 7 Will. IV and 1 Vict. c. 26. This Statute repealed the previous Statutes, except so far as regards their operation upon all wills made before January 1, 1838. The principal requirements of the Wills Act with regard to the form of wills\(^3\) are, that the will be in writing, signed at its foot or end\(^4\) by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction; such signature to be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time, who are to attest and subscribe the will in the testator's presence.

The provisions of the Statute of Frauds above noticed introduced some harsh doctrines as to the rules affecting the necessary witnesses of a will. Formerly the notion prevailed that a witness who had any interest in the subject-matter of his testimony was therefore not a credible witness at all.

---

\(^1\) See Chap. IX. \(^2\) Blackstone, ii. p. 376. \(^3\) Sect. 9. \(^4\) Further explained and defined by 15 and 16 Vict. c. 24.
Hence if the will was attested by only three witnesses, and contained a legacy or other provision in favour of one of them, his testimony would be excluded, and the will was rendered invalid for want of the testimony of three credible witnesses. To such a length was the doctrine carried, that, if one of the witnesses was a creditor, or even husband or wife of a creditor, and the will contained a provision charging the testator's estates with the payment of his debts, the evidence of the witness was inadmissible, and the whole will consequently invalid. The harshness of this doctrine was to some extent modified by the Statute 25 George II, c. 6, by which gifts to witnesses were made void, thus destroying their interest, and creditors were made competent witnesses. By the Wills Act, 7 Will. IV and 1 Vict. c. 26, section 14, it was provided that a will should not be void by reason of the incompetency of the attesting witness; and the provisions of the Act 25 George II, c. 6, as to avoiding gifts to attesting witnesses, were re-enacted. These provisions were to some extent an anticipation of the general application of the principle which, mainly owing to the demonstrations of Bentham, was being gradually introduced into the various departments of the law of evidence, that the fact of a witness having an interest is an objection only to the weight and not to the admissibility of his evidence.

The operation of a will as a mode of acquiring rights over land is peculiar, and derives from its history attributes wholly different to those which characterise a will of personal or moveable property. A will of personalty inherits to some extent the Roman conception of a successio per universitates. It confers on the executor the whole of the testator's rights in respect of his personal property, and the greater portion of his duties. The executor is the universal successor of the testator. To use the language of Roman law, he is invested with the legal character, persona or status, of his testator, so far as regards his personal property.

1 See 6 and 7 Vict. c. 85, and 14 and 15 Vict. c. 99.
ON THE OTHER HAND, THE EARLIEST DEFINITE JURISTIC CONCEPTION WHICH WAS FORMED OF AN ENGLISH WILL OF LANDS SEEMS TO HAVE BEEN, AS HAS ALREADY BEEN SAID, THAT IT OPERATED AS A DECLARATION OF THE TESTATOR’S INTENTION AS TO THE USE OR BENEFICIAL INTEREST IN LANDS—AS, IN FACT, A CONVEYANCE OF THE PARTICULAR BENEFICIAL INTEREST INTENDED TO BE DEALT WITH. THUS A WILL OF LANDS HAS ALWAYS BEEN REGARDED AS A CONVEYANCE OF A PARTICULAR INTEREST, COMING INTO OPERATION IMMEDIATELY UPON THE DEATH OF THE TESTATOR, AND NOT AS CREATING A SUCCESSION IN THE SENSE OF ROMAN LAW.

IT FOLLOWED FROM THE ORIGINAL CONCEPTION OF A WILL AS A MODE OF RAISING A USE, THAT A WILL, LIKE ANY OTHER MODE OF RAISING USES, MIGHT CREATE INTERESTS ARISING AT A FUTURE TIME, AND DIVESTING PREVIOUS INTERESTS IN A WAY UNKNOWN TO THE COMMON LAW. THESE QUALITIES SEEM TO HAVE BEEN IMPARTED EVEN TO A DEVISE OF LANDS, WHICH, BY VIRTUE OF A LOCAL CUSTOM, WAS OPERATIVE AT COMMON LAW; AND THE COMMON LAWYERS MARVELLED WHEN THEY REFLECTED ON THE WONDERFUL NATURE OF A DEVISE, IN A CASE, FOR INSTANCE, OF A BURGAGE DEVISABLE WHICH THE WILL DECLARED SHOULD BE SOLD BY THE EXECUTORS, HOW IT COULD BE THAT UPON THE TESTATOR’S DEATH THE HEIR SHOULD, ACCORDING TO THE COURSE OF THE COMMON LAW, BE IN BY DESCENT, AND YET, UPON THE SALE BY THE EXECUTORS, WHO HAD NO OTHER ESTATE OR INTEREST IN THE LANDS BEYOND THIS MERE POWER, BE DEPRIVED OF HIS INHERITANCE.

THUS AT THE TIME OF THE PASSING OF THE STATUTE OF USES THE CONCEPTION OF A WILL OF LANDS WAS THAT IT OPERATED AS A

1 YEAR BOOK, 9 HEN. VI. 24 b. BABINGTON: ‘LA NATURE DE DEVIS, OU TERRES SONT DEVISABLES, EST, QUE ON PEUT DEVISER QUE LA TERRE SERA VENDU PAR EXECUTORS, ET CECI EST BEN, COMME EST DIT ADEVAINT, ET EST MARVELLOUS LYE DE RAISON: MES CECI EST LE NATURE D’UN DEVIS, ET DEVIS ADE USE TOUT TEMPS EN TEL FORME; ET ISSAT ON AURRA LOYALMENT FRANKTENEMENT DE CEUTY QUI N’AVAIT RIEN, ET EN MEME LE MANIERE COME ON AURA FIRE FROM FLINT, ET UNCRE SUL FIRE EST DIES LA FLINT; ET CECI EST POUR PERFORMER LE DARREN VOLONTE DE LE DEVISER.’ . . . . . . PASTON: ‘UNE DEVIS EST MARVELLOUS EN LUY MEME QUAND IL PEUT PRENDRE EFFECT: CAR SI ON DEVIS EN LONDRES QUE SES EXECUTORS VENDRONT SES TERRES, ET DEVIE SEISI; SON HEIR EST CINS PAR DESCENT, ET UNCRE PAR LE VEND DES EXECUTORS IL SERA OUSTE.’ WILLIAMS ON REAL PROPERTY, P. 326.
CH. VIII. declaration of uses, taking effect at or after the testator's death, and being subject to the same rules as regulated the creation of uses by transactions operating inter vivos.

These characteristics continued to attach to wills when, by the legislation of Henry VIII, they became recognised as a mode of disposing of the legal interest in lands. Just as, before the Statutes of Henry VIII, a will of lands had been regarded as a declaration of a use, coming into effect upon the testator's death, but speaking as from its date and dealing only with the interest then intended to be conveyed; so, after those Statutes, a will of land operated as a conveyance, dealing with the legal interest possessed by the testator at the date of the will, and intended to be disposed of, but coming into effect only at his death, and being of course subject to revocation at any time before his death.

So too, as there was no difference in the power of creating interests in futuro by way of use, whether the uses were declared by will or raised inter vivos, when the power of disposing of the legal estate was created by Statute, a testator might, without availing himself of the Statute of Uses, create future or executory interests by his will, without being bound by the strict rules of the common law limiting the power of creating future estates. For instance, a devise to A in fee, but if he should not live to attain the age of twenty-one then to B in fee, or ten years after the testator's death to C in fee, would be good and effectual. These executory devises, as they are called, are subject to exactly the same rules with regard to the modes in which they can be created, the rule against perpetuity, and their liability to be construed if possible as contingent remainders, as those governing springing and shifting uses, which have been explained in the last chapter.

1 See, for the effect of similar dispositions inter vivos at common law, above, Chap. V. § 3 (2).
2 Except so far as the law is altered by 40 and 41 Vict. c. 33. See above, p. 318.
3 See Appendix to Part I, Table III.
It was at one time doubted whether the Statute of Uses had any application to wills. For instance, it was a question, if lands were devised to B and his heirs to the use of C for life, whether C's life-estate was executed by force of the Statute of Uses, or whether it derived its efficacy simply from the intention of the testator to create interests as if by the operation of that Statute. It has however long been settled that a devise to uses operates under the Statute in the same way and subject to the same rules as a conveyance to uses. Whether this is by reason of the force of the Statute of Uses, or by reason of the intention of the testator to dispose of the lands as if the Statute of Uses really operated, is a question of some metaphysical nicety, but of no practical importance.

The rules as to the construction of wills form one of the most intricate and least satisfactory portions of the modern law of real property. The subject is far too complex to be discussed at length in a treatise like the present. Starting with the general principle that the object is to ascertain the intention of the testator to be gathered from the whole will, and having regard to the fact that wills, far more frequently than formal deeds operating inter vivos, are often the composition of persons who have no legal knowledge, and sometimes little or no education, the Courts of Law and Equity have never applied the same strict and technical rules of construction to the language of wills as has been the case in regard to deeds. Thus, for instance, expressions in a will are held to be sufficient to create an estate in fee or in tail which would be insufficient in a deed. However, in applying the general principle, a vast number of subordinate rules have grown up, which have frequently in particular cases had the effect of defeating instead of furthering the intention of the testator.

For instance, in a will a devise to A and his issue is held,

1 See 2 Jarman on Wills, p. 168.
2 See instances in Blackstone, ii. 381.
in accordance with the general principle, to be sufficient to give to A an estate tail. These words would not be sufficient for the purpose in a deed; there distinct words both of procreation and of inheritance are necessary. Following out the application of the general rule, it was held that a devise to A for life, and 'in case he die without issue to B,' gives by implication an estate tail to A. The qualities of an estate tail therefore at once attached to such a gift by will, and A might at once convert his estate into a fee simple and so bar B's remainder, and all other interests subsequent to his own.
So common was this mistake, and so grievous the injustice wrought by this construction, that it was provided by the Wills Act that the words 'if A shall die without issue' and like expressions should be construed to apply to the event of A's death without leaving issue living at his decease, and that such words should not, taken alone, be sufficient to create an estate tail.

One of the commonest errors in a will made by ignorant persons was to give an estate in lands to a person without adding words of inheritance or any expression to show that it was intended that the devisee should take more than a life estate. Though the courts eagerly seized on any expressions evidencing this intention, and permitted estates in fee to be created by words which would have been totally insufficient for the purpose in a deed, it remained an inflexible rule that if lands were given to A simply, without the addition of any words from which an intention to give the fee could be gathered, A would take only a life estate. The Wills Act

1 See above, p. 205. As to the statutory substitution of the words 'in fee' or 'in tail' for the common law expressions, see 44 and 45 Vict. c. 45, s. 51.
2 This follows from the principle laid down in Shelley's case (see above, p. 225). These words were held not to mean that the land was to go to B in case of A's death without leaving issue living at his decease, but to imply a gift to A and his issue with remainder to B in the event of the failure of A's issue, whether such failure took place in A's lifetime or after his decease.
Such a gift therefore implied an estate tail vested in A.
3 7 Will. IV and 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 29.
4 The rule is laid down in the Year Book, 22 Ed. III, 16, no. 59.
THE WILLS ACT.

provided that such a gift should bear the construction which CH. VIII.
every person uninstructed in the law would naturally have placed upon it, and words of inheritance are no longer in a will necessary to pass the fee simple 1.

Other important alterations were effected in the operation and construction of wills by the same Act. The most important of these were the following. It has been seen that the original conception of a will of lands was that it operated as a present conveyance to take effect at a future time 2. It followed that if a man devised all his lands, the will applied only to those lands which were his at the date of the will, and did not affect after-purchased lands. This would be the case even if he sold and re-purchased lands which he owned at the date of the will 3. By the Wills Act it is now provided 4, that every will shall be construed with reference to the property comprised in it ‘to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.’ As the law at present stands, therefore, a devise of ‘all my lands’ will convey to the devisee not only all the lands which the testator has at the time of the will, but all which he may have acquired subsequently, and which he retains at the time of his death.
A corollary to this rule is, that in the event of the death of any person to whom lands have been specifically devised, in the lifetime of the testator, if the will contains a devise of the residue of the lands to any other person, such person shall take as part of the residue the lands so specifically devised, which would otherwise have lapsed, and gone to the heir at law 5.

As a general rule, if a devisee dies in the lifetime of the testator, though the devise may have been expressed to be made to him and his heirs, or to him and the heirs of his

1 7 Will. IV and 1 Vict. c. 26. s. 28.
2 See above, p. 338.
3 See for an early instance of this, Year Book, 44 Edward III, p. 33.
4 7 Will. IV and 1 Vict. c. 26. s. 24.
5 Ib. sect. 26.
body, the devise lapses, or fails to take effect. This rule is altered by the Wills Act in two cases. Where there is a devise creating an estate tail, for example to A and the heirs of his body, and the devisee in tail dies, leaving issue surviving the testator, who would be inheritable under the entail, the devise is not to lapse, but to take effect as if the devisee had died immediately after the testator. Further, if a devise of an interest in lands not terminable at or before the death of the devisee be made in favour of a child or other issue of the testator who dies in the testator’s lifetime leaving issue, and if any such issue survive the testator, the devise is not to lapse, but is to ‘take effect as if the death of such person had happened immediately after the death of the testator.’

Again, under the older law a devise to a man’s heir at law, giving him no estate different from that which he would have taken by descent, was inoperative; in other words, the title of the heir at law rested on descent and not on the will, no doubt because otherwise the lord would have lost his relief, wardship, and marriage. This rule was reversed by the Act to amend the Law of Inheritance.

Amongst other consequences of treating a will of lands as a conveyance to the devisee of the particular lands comprised in and dealt with by the will, one of the most important was that no liability attached to the lands in the hands of the devisee for the debts of the devisor. The history of the liability of the heir for the debts of his ancestor has been already noticed. By the Statute of Fraudulent Devises, a tenant in fee was prevented from defeating creditors, who held securities by which the heirs were bound, by devising his lands, and the devisee was made liable, equally with the heir, for such debts; and the legislation noticed above, providing for the administration of the real as well as personal estate of

---

1 7 Will. IV and 1 Vict. c. 26, sect. 32.
2 Th. a. 33.
3 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 106, s. 3.
4 See above, p. 239.
5 3 William and Mary, c. 14, repealed and as to this matter re-enacted by 11 Geo. IV and 1 Will. IV, c. 47.
6 p. 240.
deceased debtors, applies equally to the devisee and the heir.

All dispositions by will are revocable and subject to alteration by the testator at any time before his death. The provisions of the Wills Act respecting the mode of revocation and alteration are given below.

(1) The Act of Wills, Wards, and Prerogative Gifts, whereby a man may devise two parts of his land. 32 Henry VIII, c. 1.

Where the King's most royal Majesty in all the time of his most gracious and noble reign hath ever been a merciful, loving, benevolent, and most gracious Sovereign Lord, unto all and singular his loving and obedient subjects, and by many times past hath not only showed and imparted to them generally by his many, often, and beneficial pardons heretofore by authority of his parliament granted, but also by divers other ways and means, many great and ample grants and benignities, in such wise as all his said subjects been most bounden to the uttermost of all their powers and graces by them received of God to render and give unto his Majesty their most humble reverence and obedient thanks and services, with their daily and continual prayer to Almighty God for the continual preservation of his most royal estate in most kingly honour and prosperity; yet always his Majesty, being replete and endowed by God with grace, goodness, and liberality, most tenderly considering that his said obedient and loving subjects cannot use or exercise themselves according to their estates, degrees, faculties, and qualities, or to bear themselves in such wise as that they may conveniently keep and maintain their hospitalities and families, nor the good education and bringing up of their lawful generations, which in this realm (and be to God) is in all parts very great and abundant, but that in manner of necessity, as by daily experience is manifested and known, they shall not be able of their proper goods, chattels, and other moveable substance to discharge their debts, and after their degrees set forth and advance their children and posterities; Wherefore our said Sovereign Lord most virtuously considering the mortality that is to every person at God's will and pleasure most common and uncertain, of his most blessed disposition and liberality, being willing to relieve and help his said subjects in their said necessities and debility, is contented
CH. VIII. and pleased that it be ordained and enacted by authority of this present Parliament in manner and form as hereafter followeth, that is to say, That all and every person and persons having or which hereafter shall have any manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, holden in socage, or of the nature of socage tenure, and not having any manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments holden of the King our Sovereign Lord by knight-service, by socage tenure in chief, or of the nature of socage tenure in chief, nor of any other person or persons by knight-service, from the twentieth day of July in the year of our Lord MXXI, shall have full and free liberty, power, and authority to give, dispose, will, and devise, as well by his last will and testament in writing, or otherwise by any act or acts lawfully executed in his life, all his said manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any of them, at his free will and pleasure; any law, statute, or other thing heretofore had, made, or used, to the contrary notwithstanding.

(Section 2 gives the same power of devising the whole where a person holds lands of the King in socage in chief, and also holds lands of other persons in socage, and has no lands holden by knight-service.)

3. Saving alway and reserving to the King our Sovereign Lord, his heirs and successors, all his right, title and interest of primer seisin and reliefs, and also all other rights and duties for tenures in socage, or of the nature of socage tenure in chief, as heretofore hath been used and accustomed, the same manors, lands, tenements or hereditaments, to be taken, had, and sued out of and from the hands of his Highness, his heirs and successors, by the person or persons to whom any such manors, lands, tenements or hereditaments shall be disposed, willed, or devised, in such and like manner and form as hath been used by any heir or heirs before the making of this statute; and saving and reserving also fines for alienations of such manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments holden of the King our Sovereign Lord in socage, or of the nature of socage tenure in chief, whereof there shall be any alteration of freehold or inheritance, made by will or otherwise, as is aforesaid.

4. And it is further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all and singular person and persons having any manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments of estate of inheritance holden of the King's Highness in chief by knight-service, or of the nature of knight-service in chief, from the said twentieth day of July, shall have full power and authority by his last will, by writing or CH. VIII.
otherwise, by any act or acts lawfully executed in his life, to give, dispose, will or assign two parts of the same manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, in three parts to be divided, or else as much of the said manors, lands, tenements or hereditaments as shall extend or amount to the yearly value of two parts of the same in three parts to be divided, in certainty and by special divisions as it may be known in severality, to and for the advancement of his wife, preferment of his children, and payment of his debts or otherwise at his will and pleasure; any law, statute, custom or other thing to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

5. Saving and reserving to the King our Sovereign Lord the custody, wardship and primer seisin, or any of them as the case shall require, of as much of the same manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments as shall amount and extend to the full and clear yearly value of the third part thereof without any diminution, dower, fraud, covin, charge or abridgment of any of the same third part or of the full profits thereof.

6. (Saving of fines for alienation.)

7–13. (Further provisions extending the power of devising lands in all cases to two-thirds of knight-service lands, and to the whole of those held in socage; the wardship of the lord being reserved as to the remaining third part of knight-service lands.)

14–17. (Miscellaneous provisions reserving rights of king and lords.)

(1) An Act for the Explanation of the Statute of Wills.

34 and 35 Henry VIII, cap. 5.

The former Statute is explained in sections 3–8 to cover cases of a person or persons having a sole estate, or interest in fee simple, or seised in fee simple or coparcenary, or in common in fee simple in possession, reversion, or remainder.

---

1 See 34 and 35 Henry VIII, c. 5, sect. 6. This was interpreted to mean that when lands held of the King were devised by will, the devisee must sue out of Chancery the King's 'pardon for alienation,' paying for it the third part of the yearly value of the lands.
CH. VIII. The devise may be 'to any person or persons, except Bodies Politick and Corporate.'

And it is further declared and enacted by the authority aforesaid, That wills or testaments made of any manors, lands, tenements or other hereditaments by any woman covert, or person within the age of twenty-one years, idiot, or by any person de non sano memory, shall not be taken to be good or effectual in the law.

(3) The Act for the Amendment of the Laws with Respect to Wills. 7 William IV and 1 Victoria, cap. 26.

This Statute repeals the former Statutes upon the subject of wills, and constitutes the basis upon which the present law of wills of real property rests. The most important of its general provisions are the following:

Sect. 3. It shall be lawful for every person to devise, bequeath, or dispose of, by his will executed in manner hereinafter required, all real estate and all personal estate which he shall be entitled to, either at law or in equity, at the time of his death, and which, if not so devised, bequeathed, or disposed of, would devolve upon the heir-at-law, or customary heir of him, or, if he became entitled by descent, of his ancestor, or upon his executor or administrator; and that the power hereby given shall extend to all real estate of the nature of customary freehold or tenant right, or customary or copyhold, notwithstanding that the testator may not have surrendered the same to the use of his will; or notwithstanding that being entitled as heir, devisee, or otherwise to be admitted thereto he shall not have been admitted thereto, or notwithstanding that the same, in consequence of the want of a custom to devise or surrender to the use of a will, or otherwise, could not at law have been disposed of by will, if this Act had not been made, or notwithstanding that the same, in consequence of there being a custom that a will or a surrender to the use of a will should continue in

1 The numbering of the sections in these Statutes is taken from 'Statutes at Large.' The divisions in 'Statutes of the Realm' are different.
2 See above, p. 247.
3 See above, p. 248, n. 4. By this provision wills of copyhold estates are assimilated to wills of freeholds.
4 See above, p. 251, n. 2.
force for a limited time only, or any other special custom, could not have been disposed of by will according to the power contained in this Act, if this Act had not been made; and also to estates for a term of years, whether there shall or shall not be any special occupant thereof, and whether the same shall be freehold, customary freehold, tenant right, customary or copyhold, or of any other tenure, and whether the same shall be a corporeal or an incorporeal hereditament; and also to all contingent, executory, or other future interests in any real or personal estate, whether the testator may or may not be ascertained as the person or one of the persons in whom the same respectively may become vested, and whether he may be entitled thereto under the instrument by which the same respectively were created, or under any disposition thereof by deed or will; and also to all rights of entry for conditions broken, and other rights of entry; and also to such of the same estates, interests, and rights respectively, and other real and personal estate as the testator may be entitled to at the time of his death, notwithstanding that he may become entitled to the same subsequently to the execution of his will.

7. No will made by any person under the age of twenty-one years shall be valid.

8. No will made by any married woman shall be valid, except such a will as might have been made by a married woman before the passing of this Act.

18. Every will made by a man or woman shall be revoked by his or her marriage, except a will made in exercise of a power of appointment, when the real or personal estate thereby appointed would not in default of such appointment pass to his or her heir, customary heir, executor, or administrator, or the person entitled as his or her next of kin under the Statute of Distributions.

---

1 See above, p. 126, n. 3.
2 See above, p. 225.
3 A right of entry, though it could only be reserved in favour of the grantor or his heirs (above, p. 220), is thus rendered capable of alienation by will. These rights are also, by 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106. s. 6, made alienable by deed inter vivos.
4 See above, p. 298, n. 1. A married woman could (before the recent statute) make a will in exercise of a power of appointment vested in her (see above, pp. 218-220). She could also dispose by will of her equitable interest in real property held to her separate use. The disability of a married woman to dispose of her separate property by will is now entirely removed by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 75. s. 1).
5 Before this enactment the marriage of a man was not sufficient to revoke his will unless he had also a child born to him.
CH. VIII. 19. No will shall be revoked by any presumption of an intention on the ground of an alteration in circumstances.

20. No will or codicil or any part thereof shall be revoked otherwise than as aforesaid, or by another will or codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same, and executed in the manner in which a will is hereinbefore required to be executed, or by the burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same by the testator, or by some person in his presence and by his direction, with the intention of revoking the same.
CHAPTER IX.

ABOLITION OF MILITARY TENURES.

It was doubtless the prevalence of the system of conveying lands to uses which, by alleviating the pressure of the feudal burdens, delayed the change in the law which is the subject of this chapter. When by the selfish legislation of Henry VIII this mode of alleviation was rendered ineffectual, and the pressure was still further increased by the creation, under the provisions of the Statute 32 Henry VIII, cap. 46, of a Court of Wards and Liveries, for the express purpose of providing a more effectual and speedy mode of asserting the king's feudal rights, the burdens became too heavy to be borne; and the king being now the immediate lord of a vast portion of the land of the country, all classes of tenants were more interested in obtaining relief from feudal burdens owing to the king, than in preserving those due to such of them as were lords of manors. A striking picture of the condition of a tenant in capite by knight-service is given by Blackstone¹. "The heir, on the death of his ancestor, if of full age, was plundered of the first emoluments arising from his inheritance, by way of relief and primer seizin; and, if under age, of the whole of his estate during infancy. And then, as Sir Thomas Smith very feelingly complains², "when he came to his own, after he was

¹ Vol. ii. p. 76.
ABOLITION OF MILITARY TENURES.

CH. IX. out of wardship, his woods decayed, houses fallen down, stock wasted and gone, lands let forth and ploughed to be barren;” to reduce him still farther, he was yet to pay half-a-year’s profits as a fine for suing out livery; and also the price or value of his marriage. Add to this the untimely and expensive honour of knighthood, to make his poverty more completely splendid 1; and when by these deductions his fortune was so shattered and ruined, that perhaps he was obliged to sell his patrimony, he had not even that poor privilege allowed him without paying an exorbitant fine for a licence of alienation.

In the reign of James I, a project was brought forward for the removal of feudal burdens by converting all tenures of lands held of the king or other lords into tenure by fealty only, and such rent as was then due, and prohibiting the creation of any other species of tenure, compensation being made to the king and other lords for the loss of feudal dues by the payment of an annual rent. This proposal was not carried into effect. Sir E. Coke mentions it with a strong expression of approval, and of hope for its ultimate success 2.

This hope was realised by the Long Parliament. On the 24th of February, 1645, the House of Commons sent up to the Lords a resolution, ‘That the Court of Wards and Liveries,

1 The prerogative of the Crown of compelling the tenants in capite to be knighted, recognised by the Statute de Militibus, 1 Edward II, stat. 1, had become one of the most oppressive of the feudal burdens. It was abolished by the Statute 16 Car. I, c. 20. See Blackstone, i. 69.

2 ‘At the parliament held 18 Jacobi Regis it was moved on the King’s behalf, and commended by the King to the Parliament, for a competent yearly rent to be assured to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, that the King would assent that all wardships, primer seisms, reliefs for tenures in capite or by knight’s-service should be discharged. Wherein amongst certain old parliament men these thirteen things did fall into consideration for the effecting thereof. . . Which motion, though it proceeded not to effect, yet we thought good to remember it together with these considerations, hoping that so good a motion, tending to the honour and profit of the King and his crown for ever, and the freedom and the quiet of his subjects and their posterities, will some time or other (by the grace of God) by authority of Parliament one way or other take effect and be established.’ Coke’s 4th Institute, p. 203, &c.
and all wardships, liveries, primer seisins, and ousterlemais, and all other charges incident or arising for or by reason of wardship, livery, primer seisin, or ousterlemais, be from this day taken away; and that all tenures by homage, and all fines, licences, seizures, and pardons for alienation, and all other charges incident thereunto, be likewise taken away; and that all tenures by knight-service either of his Majesty or others, or by knight-service or socage in capite of his Majesty, be turned into free and common socage.'

The Lords at once assented to the vote in the form in which it was sent up by the Commons; and the resolution was confirmed by an Act of Parliament passed in 1656.

---

1 A message was brought from the House of Commons by Sir Henry Vane, Junior, Knight, "That in this time of great distractions, wherein the Lords and the House of Commons and the whole kingdom have adventured their lives and fortunes, and for recompense to the whole kingdom they have thought to take away a great burden, therefore have made a vote wherein the House of Commons desire their Lordships' concurrence."

2 Resolved upon the question nemine contradicente that this House agrees to this vote as it is now brought up from the House of Commons." (Journals of the House of Lords, vol. viii. p. 183. Die Martis 24° die Februarii.)

3 Whereas the four and twentieth day of February in the year of our Lord 1645 the Court of Wards and Liveries and all wardships, liveries, primer seisins, and ousterlemais, and all other charges incident or arising for or by reason of wardships, livery, primer seisins, or ousterlemais, and all tenures by homage, and all fines, licences, seizures, and pardons for alienation, and all other charges incident thereunto, were by the Lords and Commons then assembled in Parliament taken away, and all tenures by knight-service, either of the king or others, or by knight-service in capite, or socage in capite of the king, were turned into free and common socage, for the further establishing and confirming the same, Be it declared and enacted by His Highness the Lord Protector and the Parliament, that the Court of Wards and Liveries, and all wardships, liveries, primer seisins, and ousterlemais, and all other charges incident and arising for or by reason of any such tenure, wardship, livery, primer seisin, ousterlemais, be taken away, from the said four and twentieth day of February 1645, and that all homage, fines, licences, seizures, pardons for alienation, incident or arising for or by reason of wardship, livery, primer seisin, ousterlemais, and all other charges incident thereunto be likewise taken away, and is hereby adjudged and declared to be taken away from the said twenty-fourth day of February 1645, And that all tenures in capite and by knight-service of the late king or any other person, and all tenures by socage in chief, be taken away, and all tenures are hereby enacted and declared to be turned into free and common socage from the said twenty-
CH. IX. Upon the Restoration it was found necessary to confirm by Statute the acts of the Long Parliament in respect of feudal tenures.

It will be seen that the subjoined Statute abolished all the ancient law with respect to tenure by knight-service and its incidents. With the exception of the provisions enabling the father to appoint a guardian by will, it did not introduce any new law. The principal effects of the Statute have been that in most instances all remembrance of the relation between lord and freehold tenant has passed away, and that all freehold lands have become capable of being devised by will.

12 Charles II, cap. 24.

An Act taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries, and Tenures in Capite, and by Knight-Service, and Purveyance, and for settling a Revenue upon his Majesty in lieu thereof.

Whereas it hath been found by former experience that the Court of Wards and Liveries and tenures by knight-service either of the king or others, or by knight-service in capite, or socage in capite of the king, and the consequents upon the same, have been much more burthensome, grievous, and prejudicial to the kingdom eighth day of February 1645, and shall be so construed, adjudged and declared to be for ever hereafter turned into free and common socage. Nevertheless it is hereby enacted that all rents certain, and heriots, due to meane lords or other private persons, shall be paid; and that where any relief or double ancient yearly rent, upon the death of an ancestor, was in such cases formerly due and payable, a double ancient yearly rent only in lieu thereof shall now be paid upon the death of an ancestor as in free and common socage, and that the same shall be recovered by like remedy in law, as rents and duties in free and common socage.' Scobell's Acts and Ordinances of Parliament, Anno 1656, c. 4.

1 Sects. 8 and 9. 2 See above, p. 191. 3 See above, p. 335.

4 Madox, Hist. of Exch. p. 432, note, suggests that the expression 'tenures in capite' is used erroneously in this Statute. 'Tenant in capite' properly means simply 'immediate tenant,' whether by knight-service, socage, or otherwise. But a confused idea had arisen that tenure in capite was a particular species of tenure of the Crown, distinct from ordinary knight-service, &c. Thus Elizabeth by letters patent granted lands 'tenendum de nobis in libero socagio et non in capite.' This, as Madox says, is a contradiction in terms.
than they have been beneficial to the king; And whereas since the intermission of the said Court, which hath been from the four and twentieth day of February, which was in the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred forty and five, many persons have by will and otherwise made disposal of their lands held by knight-service, whereupon divers questions might possibly arise unless some seasonable remedy be taken to prevent the same; Be it therefore enacted by the King our Sovereign Lord, with the assent of the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, and it is hereby enacted, That the Court of Wards and Liveries, and all wardships, liveries, primer seisins and ouster-lemains, values and forfeitures of marriages, by reason of any tenure of the King's Majesty, or of any other by knight-service, and all mean rates, and all other gifts, grants, and charges, incident or arising for or by reason of wardships, liveries, primer seisins, or ousterlemains, be taken away and discharged, and are hereby enacted to be taken away and discharged, from the said twenty-fourth day of February one thousand six hundred forty-five; any law, statute, custom, or usage to the contrary hereof in any wise notwithstanding: And that all fines for alienations, seizures, and pardons for alienations, tenure by homage, and all charges incident or arising for or by reason of wardship, livery, primer sein, or ousterlemain, or tenure by knight-service, escuege, and also aide pour filz marrier, et pur faire fils chevalier, and all other charges incident thereunto, be likewise taken away and discharged from the said twenty-fourth day of February one thousand six hundred forty and five: any law, statute, custom, or usage to the contrary hereof in any wise notwithstanding: And that all tenures by knight-service of the king, or of any other person, and by knight-service in capite, and by socage in capite of the king, and the fruits and consequents thereof, happened or which shall or may hereafter happen or arise thereupon or whereby, be taken away and discharged; any law, statute, custom, or usage to the contrary hereof in any wise notwithstanding; And all tenures of any honours, manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, of any estate of inheritance at the common law, held either of the king or of any other person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, are hereby enacted to be turned into free and common socage, to all intents and purposes, from the said twenty-fourth day of February one thousand six hundred forty-five, and shall be so

1 See above, pp. 39-41, and Chap. II. § 4.
2 As to socage, see above, pp. 45-47.
construed, adjudged, and deemed to be from the said twenty-fourth day of February one thousand six hundred forty-five, and for ever hereafter, turned into free and common socage; any law, statute, custom, or usage to the contrary hereof in any wise notwithstanding.

2. And that the same shall for ever hereafter stand and be discharged of all tenure by homage, escuage, voyages royal, and charges for the same, wardships incident to tenure by knight's-service, and values and forfeitures of marriage, and all other charges incident to tenure by knight-service, and of and from aide pur file marrier, and aide pur faire fitz chivalier; any law, statute, usage, or custom to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. And that all conveyances and devises of any manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, made since the said twenty-fourth day of February, shall be expounded to be of such effect as if the same manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments had been then held and continued to be holden in free and common socage only; any law, statute, custom, or usage to the contrary hereof in any wise notwithstanding.

3. And be it further ordained and enacted by the authority of this present Parliament, That one Act made in the reign of King Henry the Eighth, intituled An Act for the Establishment of the Court of the King's Wards; and also one Act of Parliament made in the thirty-third year of the reign of the said King Henry the Eighth, concerning the officers of the Courts of Wards and Liveries, and every clause, article, and matter in the said Acts contained, shall from henceforth be repealed and utterly void.

4. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all tenures hereafter to be created by the King's Majesty, his heirs or successors, upon any gifts or grants of any manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, of any estate of inheritance at the common law, shall be in free and common socage, and shall be adjudged to be in free and common socage only, and not by knight-service, or in capite; and shall be discharged of all wardship, value and forfeiture of marriage, livery, primer seisin, ousterementain, aide pur faire fitz chivalier and pur file marrier; any law, statute, or reservation to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding.

5. Provided nevertheless, and be it enacted, That this Act, or anything herein contained, shall not take away, nor be construed to take away, any rents certain, heriots, or suits of court, belonging or incident to any former tenure now taken away or altered

1 See note 4, p. 352.
by virtue of this Act, or other services incident or belonging to tenure in common socage due or to grow due to the King's Majesty, or mean lords, or other private person, or the fealty and distresses incident thereunto; and that such relief shall be paid in respect of such rents as is paid in case of a death of a tenant in common socage.

6. Provided always, and be it enacted, That anything herein contained shall not take away, nor be construed to take away any fines for alienation due by particular customs of particular manors and places, other than fines for alienations of lands or tenements holden immediately of the king in capite.

7. Provided also, and be it further enacted, That this Act, or anything herein contained, shall not take away, or be construed to take away, tenures in frank-almoign ¹, or to subject them to any greater or other services than they now are; nor to alter or change any tenure by copy of court-roll, or any services incident thereunto; nor to take away the honorary services of grand serjeanty ², other than of wardship, marriage, and value of forfeiture of marriage, escuage, voyages royal, and other charges incident to tenure by knight-service; and other than aide pur faire fils chivalier, and aide pur fil marrier.

8. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That where any person hath or shall have any child or children under the age of one and twenty years, and not married at the time of his death; that it shall and may be lawful to and for the father of such child or children, whether born at the time of the decease of the father, or at that time in ventre sa mere, or whether such father be within the age of one and twenty years or of full age, by deed executed in his life-time, or by his last will and testament in writing, in the presence of two or more credible witnesses in such manner, and from time to time as he shall respectively think fit, to dispose of the custody and tuition of such child or children for and during such time as he or they shall respectively remain under the age of twenty-one years, or any lesser time, to any person or persons in possession or remainder, other than Popish reclusants; and that such disposition of the custody of such child or children, made since the twenty-fourth of February one thousand six hundred and forty-five, or hereafter to be made, shall be good and effectual against all and every person or persons claiming the custody or tuition of such child or children, as guardian in socage or otherwise: And that such person or persons to whom the

¹ See above, p. 38.
² See above, p. 38.
CH. IX. custody of such child or children hath been or shall be so disposed or devised as aforesaid, shall and may maintain an action of ravishment of ward or trespass against any person or persons which shall wrongfully take away or detain such child or children, for the recovery of such child or children; and shall and may recover damages for the same in the said action for the use and benefit of such child or children.

9. And be it further enacted, That such person or persons to whom the custody of such child or children hath been or shall be so disposed or devised, shall and may take into his or their custody to the use of such child or children the profits of all lands tenements and hereditaments of such child or children; and also the custody, tuition, and management of the goods, chattels, and personal estate of such child or children, till their respective age of one and twenty years, or any lesser time, according to such disposition aforesaid, and may bring such action or actions in relation thereto as by law a guardian in common socage might do.

10. Provided also, That this Act, or anything herein contained, shall not extend to alter or prejudice the custom of the City of London, nor of any other city or town corporate, or of the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, concerning orphans; nor to discharge any apprentice from his apprenticeship.

11. Provided also, That neither this Act, nor anything therein contained, shall infringe or hurt any title of honour, feudal or other, by which any person hath or may have right to sit in the Lords' House of Parliament, as to his or their title of honour or sitting in Parliament, and the privilege belonging to them as Peers; this Act or anything therein contained to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding.

15-52. Provisions for recompense to his Majesty for the Court of Wards and purveyances by an excise duty upon beer, ale, etc.

1 See above, p. 41; and compare Chap. II. § 4 (2), (3), and Chap. III. § 2.
CHAPTER X.

TITLES OR MODES OF ACQUISITION OF RIGHTS OVER THINGS REAL.

The subject of titles or modes of acquisition of rights follows in logical order next upon the discussion of the history and nature of the rights themselves. It is proposed in this chapter to present in outline a brief account of the various modes of acquisition of rights over land recognised by English law. For this purpose it will be necessary to refer back to many points which have been explained in the preceding chapters, and also to notice the main changes in the law which have taken place subsequent to those which have been already mentioned.

A title to a right or a collection of rights over land is, according to Blackstone¹, 'the means whereby the owner of lands hath the just possession of his property.'

According to the fuller definition given by Austin, it is the collection of 'facts or events on which by the dispositions of the law rights arise or come into being, and also the facts or events on which by the dispositions of the law they terminate, or are extinguished².' For practical purposes the inquiry may be confined to the different modes of acquiring rights over land. For, according to English law, rights over land are never lost or abandoned so as to become \textit{res nullius}. A mode of losing a right of this class is always a mode of acquisition by somebody else. For example, if lands cease to have an owner by reason of a failure of heirs, they at once escheat to the lord\(^1\). For the purposes of this chapter, therefore, the word ‘title’ may be taken to mean simply ‘mode of acquisition.’

¹ ii. p. 195. ² Austin, ii. p. 902.

Many classifications have been given of the groups of facts or events to which the law attaches as a consequence the loss or acquisition of rights over land. The following arrangement may perhaps be accepted in default of a better. There are some recognised modes of acquisition which cannot well be brought under one head. To attempt to do so would be to present a false conception of a uniformity which does not exist\(^2\).

Titles or modes of acquisition may perhaps be most conveniently classed under the heads of title by \textit{alienation}, title by \textit{succession}, or devolution from a person dying intestate, and the remaining modes of acquisition must be thrown into a miscellaneous class.

\textbf{§ 1. Title by alienation.}

By alienation is meant the intentional and voluntary transfer of a right by the person or persons in whom the right resides to another person or persons\(^3\).

In order that title by alienation may be effectual in any given case, the following conditions must be present. The person having the right intended to be conveyed must be of full capacity to convey it; the person to whom the right is to be conveyed must be of capacity to take and keep it; the purpose of the conveyance must be such as the law recognises as afford-

\footnotesize \begin{enumerate}
\item See above, p. 82.
\item See Austin, ii. p. 931.
\item See Austin's Jurisprudence, ii. 904. Sometimes alienation is divided into voluntary and involuntary alienation. I prefer to treat of the different kinds of so-called involuntary alienation separately under the miscellaneous kinds.
\end{enumerate}
ing a sufficient motive for the transfer of the property; and, lastly, the proper mode of carrying the conveyance into effect must be observed.

By the first of these conditions it is necessary that the person conveying should possess the requisite intelligence, and be in a position to exercise it freely. Hence conveyances by idiots or lunatics are absolutely void. Such a person is incapable of the requisite intention. An infant (a person under twenty-one years of age) is not completely capable of having the requisite intention. His conveyances are voidable, subject, that is, to be ratified or avoided by him when he comes of age.

Powers of dealing with the estates of idiots and lunatics, and of enabling infants for certain purposes to make effectual conveyances with the sanction of the Chancery Division of the High Court, have been given by various Acts of Parliament.

Similar principles apply to conveyances by persons under dures, that is, under pressure of illegal bodily restraint, or of danger to life or limb. Conveyances induced by such pressure are voidable.

Married women were before the recent Act under a special disability with regard to alienation. By the common law, as has been seen, the husband took a sole estate in the lands of the wife during the marriage. The wife could not moreover by her own separate act during the continuance of the marriage make any effectual conveyance of her reversionary interest in lands. The old mode of making a conveyance of the wife's lands was by a fine, to which the husband and wife were

---

1 Inconsistently enough, a feoffment with livery of seisin, at least before 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106. s. 4, was not void but only voidable, and that not by the lunatic himself but only by his committee or heir. This arose probably from the almost superstitious veneration for this solemn mode of conveying lands.
2 Except that a feoffment of gavelkind lands by a person of the age of fifteen years is by the custom of gavelkind binding upon him. See above, p. 45, n. 3.
3 See Williams on Real Property, pp. 69, 70.
4 Blackstone, i. 130, 136.
5 See above, Chap. II. § 8.
both parties. To the validity of a fine it was necessary that the wife should be examined apart from her husband, as a security that the conveyance was not made by her under the coercion of her husband. At the present day the legal estate of a married woman who has both been married and acquired the property to be dealt with before 1883 can only be conveyed by deed executed with the concurrence of her husband, and acknowledged by the woman, on being examined by a judge or commissioners apart from her husband, to be her own act. After the growth of equitable interests, and the emancipation of married women from the restraints of the common law as to property by enabling them to be in the position of cestuis que trustent, or beneficiaries, all the ordinary powers of disposition became capable of being exercised by married women over such equitable interests. When land therefore has been vested in a trustee in trust for a married woman, she is as capable of disposing of the interest as if she were unmarried, subject only to the restraint on alienation usually introduced into settlements, as has been noticed above. And now in the case of every woman married after 1882, or, if married before 1883, so far as regards property acquired after 1882, no restriction any longer exists upon her absolute power of disposition as if she were unmarried. A settlement of her property may however still contain a restraint against anticipation during coverture, and in this respect a woman has a power not possessed by a man.

In order that an alienation may be effectual, the alienee must be capable of receiving and keeping the estate alienated. The intention of accepting is not in English law of as great importance as a complete intention to give. It is said to be the law of England that in no instance can property be

---

1 Williams on Real Property, p. 245.
2 2 and 4 Will. IV. c. 74. ss. 77-91.
3 See above, p. 230. As to the history of the power of a married woman to dispose of interests in land by will, see Chap. VIII. p. 347.
4 45 and 46 Vict. c. 75.
5 Ib. s. 19.
vested in a person by alienation against his will. At the same time it appears to be the case that, provided the act of conveying be perfect and complete on the part of the alienor, the property, in the absence of an intention not to accept, vests in the alienee. At all events no evidence is necessary to show that the alienee intended to accept it. Nor would the conveyance be void although there were the strongest evidence that the alienee was incapable of an accepting mind. A conveyance of lands to an infant or a lunatic is perfectly valid, as against the alienor and third parties, though it is liable to be avoided in favour of the lunatic or the infant, or their representatives, if it should be deemed disadvantageous to him. In all other cases the proper mode of refusing to accept a conveyance or devise of land, and so rendering it inoperative, is an execution by an alienee of full capacity of a deed of disclaimer.

Before 1883 a married woman might purchase lands, and the conveyance was good unless the husband avoided it during the coverture by some act expressing his dissent. And even if the husband consented, the woman or her heirs might avoid the purchase after the decease of the husband: and a married woman might by deed acknowledged disclaim a purchase. These rules are now superseded by the full capacity of acquiring and holding property given to women married or acquiring property since the commencement of 1883.

There are certain incapacities to hold lands, which should be noticed. The incapacity of corporations has already been mentioned. Aliens too formerly might purchase, but the land was held subject to the right of the Crown to seize and

---

1 Williams on Real Property, p. 100.
2 Blackstone, ii. p. 292.
3 See Townsend v. Tickell, 3 Barnwell and Alderson, p. 31; Doe on the demise of Smyth v. Smyth, 6 Barnwell and Cresswell, p. 112; Doe on the demise of Winder v. Lawes, 7 Adolphus and Ellis, p. 212.
4 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 7.
5 45 and 46 Vict. c. 75, s. 1.
6 Chap. IV. § 2.
appropriate it, upon the facts being ascertained by the verdict of a jury, technically called ‘upon office found,’ in a process called ‘inquest of office.’ By an early exception to this rule an alien was permitted to hold a lease for years of land for the purpose of trade or merchandise. And by the Naturalization Act 1870 aliens are placed on the same footing with regard to the purchase and disposition of lands as natural-born British subjects.

A further restraint on alienation in reference to the purposes or objects for which it may be made is contained in the Statute 9 Geo. II, c. 36, which, after reciting that ‘gifts or alienations of lands in mortmain are prohibited or restrained by Magna Carta and divers other wholesome laws as prejudicial to and against the common utility, nevertheless this public mischief has of late increased by many large and imprudent alienations or dispositions made by languishing or dying persons to uses called charitable uses, to the disherison of their lawful heirs,’ provided that no lands or hereditaments, or money or personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of lands should be conveyed or settled for any charitable uses unless by deed executed in the presence of two or more credible witnesses twelve calendar months at least before the death of the donor and enrolled in Chancery within six months of its execution, and unless the gift be made to take effect in possession immediately, without any reservation in favour of the grantor or persons claiming through him. By this Statute therefore a gift of lands to a charity by will is made wholly void. Certain relaxations of the provisions of the Act of George II have been since made by various Statutes in favour of gifts

1 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 2. But the Act does not apply to interests arising by disposition or devolution happening before the passing of the Act.

2 By the Statute 25 Henry VIII, c. 10, conveyances of land to the use of churches, or for the services of a priest, etc., were prohibited. Subsequently it was held that this prohibition did not extend to charitable uses. Blackstone, ii. p. 372. And see 43 Elizabeth, c. 4.

3 There is an exception in the Statute (s. 4) in favour of the two Universities, and the Colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster.
for the purposes of schools, literary, scientific, or religious purposes, and public parks or museums. Otherwise the law remains generally as fixed by that Statute.

The freedom of alienation is also subject to restraint in favour of creditors, and purchasers for valuable considerations. By the Statute 13 Elizabeth, c. 5, conveyances of lands and goods made for the purpose of delaying, hindering, or defrauding creditors are made void as against them unless made for valuable consideration to a bona fide purchaser without notice of the fraud. It is under the provisions of this Statute that proceedings are frequently taken to set aside post-nuptial settlements on a wife or children made with the intention of placing the property of the indebted settlor out of the reach of his creditors. And by the Statute 27 Elizabeth, c. 4, voluntary conveyances of estates in land, that is, conveyances without any consideration, such as money or marriage, and conveyances made with any clause of revocation at the will of the grantor, are void as against subsequent purchasers for money or other valuable consideration. Thus any person who takes by virtue of a mere voluntary gift can never be absolutely secure that his donor may not sell the land to a purchaser for money, which would confer on such purchaser a good title as against the donee.

Such are the conditions, positive and negative, of alienation. Subject to these conditions, the power of alienating the interest which the alienor has is complete, provided that he follows the mode required by law.

It remains to point out the acts by which a person entitled to rights over lands may transfer them to another, or in other words, the mode in which a person may acquire those rights by alienation.

1 Compare 46 & 47 Vict. (Bankruptcy Act, 1883), s. 47.

2 A mortgagee is a purchaser within the meaning of this Act, therefore a settlement on a wife or child after marriage may be set aside in favour of a subsequent mortgagee (Chapman v. Emery, Cowper’s Reports, 273). Natural love and affection is not a sufficient motive or consideration. As against subsequent purchasers such conveyances are ‘fraudulent, feigned, and covious.’ s. 2.
CH. X. The first division into which alienation falls is alienation inter vivos, and alienation by will. It seems correct, for reasons already given, to class acquisition of rights over land by will as a mode of alienation and not as a mode of succession. In Roman law, as has already been pointed out\(^1\), and in our own law of personal property, wills must be considered as a mode of succession.

\(^1\) Postponing acquisition by will and passing to alienation inter vivos, that is where the person who loses the right and the person who acquires it are both living, and the right passes by a voluntary act from one to the other, the next division will follow the division of rights already given in the Appendix to Part I\(^2\).

Alienation may be divided into the alienation (2) of rights of property or ownership over land, meaning by property or ownership the enjoyment of those indefinite rights of use over land by virtue of which in ordinary language a person is entitled to speak of land as his property\(^3\); (3) of rights in alieno solo, which comprise the class called incorporeal hereditaments in the narrower sense\(^4\). Under this class of rights in alieno solo may also be placed, following the classification given above, creditors’ rights\(^5\).

\(^4\) Taking first the modes of acquiring those rights in alieno solo which in common legal language are styled incorporeal hereditaments, and are divided as has been seen into the classes of easements and profits, the appropriate mode of acquiring these rights is by grant; that is, by the owner of the soil over which the right is to be exercised making, by deed operating either at common law or under the Statute of Uses, a specific grant of the right of way, right of common, or other easement or profit. No solemnity short of a deed is regarded by our law as sufficient to create a right of this kind. A deed is equally necessary whether

\(^1\) See above, p. 236.
\(^2\) See Table IV, below, p. 387.
\(^3\) See Table I, p. 264.
\(^4\) See above, p. 261.
\(^5\) See above, Appendix to Part I, § 1 (11).
\(^6\) See above, lb. (14).
the right of limited user for convenience or profit be a right to be enjoyed by the successive possessors of a dominant tenement (a right appurtenant), or a right to be enjoyed by the grantee or by him and his heirs irrespective of the possession of any tenement (a right in gross).

Sometimes rights of this class are created not by express grant but by implication in a grant of other rights. For instance, if the owner of two houses A and B, both of which necessarily draw their supply of water from a well situated in the curtilage of A, conveys away B to a purchaser without any mention of the right to draw water from the well of A, the right will nevertheless pass and be available in favour of the possessors of B against the successive possessors of A. So if a man grants to another a piece of land in the centre of and surrounded by the grantor's land, he by implication also grants a right of way over some portion of the land which he retains. And of course wherever an easement or profit is appurtenant to the ownership of any particular tenement, such easement or profit will pass upon alienation of the tenement to the alienee without any special grant thereof.

An important mode of acquiring these rights, though perhaps not logically coming under the head of alienation, must not be omitted here; that is, by what is called prescription, or actual use and enjoyment of the right for a specified time. Before the passing of the Prescription Act this mode of acquiring rights in alieno solo was regarded exclusively as a species of title by grant, differing only from an express grant in the evidence by which it was established. If it be proved that the right has been in fact enjoyed as far back as memory can trace it, and no origin of the right be shown, the presumption is that it has been enjoyed from time immemorial, that is, from some

1 See above, Chap. III. § 18. p. 148.
2 See Gale on Easements, 4th ed., p. 86, where this class of rights is discussed under the head of 'Disposition of the Owner of two Tenements,' called by French writers 'Disposition du père de famille.'
3 2 and 3 Will. IV, c. 71. See above, p. 151.
period anterior to the first year of Richard I, the time at which legal memory commences, and that it was created before that period by the owner of the soil. And even if the right were shown to have been created within the time of legal memory, juries were directed, when the right was in question, to presume that as a fact the right had been expressly granted by the owner of the soil, and that the grant had been lost. This mode of supporting rights was felt to be most unsatisfactory, and at length the Prescription Act was passed, by which a perfect title to easements and profits is conferred upon persons who have enjoyed them as of right continuously for certain periods of time specified in the Act. Its provisions are somewhat complicated, but the practical effect is that the enjoyment of an easement, as for instance of a way or of the access of light and air through a window, for twenty years, and the enjoyment of a profit à prendre, as for instance of pasturage on a common, for thirty years, works the acquisition of the right. The enjoyment must be by a person claiming right thereto, hence it may be defeated by showing that it has been enjoyed avowedly in exercise of some continuing permission or authority of the owner of the soil.

(5) The modes in which creditors acquire rights over the lands of their debtors have already been noticed. A judgment-creditor, that is, a creditor who has obtained a judgment at law against his debtor, may, as has been seen, sue out a

1 See above, p. 150; and Gale on Easements, p. 146, etc.
2 and 3 Will. IV, c. 71. The Prescription Act does not do away with the common law doctrine of prescription; its provisions are additions to, and do not supersede, the old law.
3 2 and 3 Will. IV, c. 71. s. 1, 2. The Act provides that rights enjoyed for such periods respectively shall not be defeated by showing only that the right was first enjoyed at any time prior to such period, and that after the easement or profit had been enjoyed for forty or sixty years respectively, the right shall be absolute and indefeasible, unless it be proved that it was enjoyed by some agreement in writing.
4 See Tickle v. Brown, 4 Adolphus and Ellis, 369.
5 Chap. V. § 5.
writ of execution called an elegit. Till recently the effect of a judgment by itself, without execution, was most important as affecting the interests of subsequent purchasers of the judgment-debtor’s lands. By a recent Act, however, the land of the debtor is not to be affected by any judgment against him until it has been actually delivered in execution by virtue of a writ of elegit or other lawful authority. The creditor who has pursued this remedy may cause the sheriff to execute the writ, and obtain possession of the lands at his hands, which entitles him to enter and take possession and hold till the debt and costs be satisfied. The creditor may also, after due registration of the writ, obtain an order from the Chancery Division of the High Court for a sale of the lands in order to satisfy what is due to him.

The nature of a mortgage has been already described. A mortgagee may either have the legal estate in the lands vested in him, in which case he was in the view of the Courts of Law (before the Judicature Act 1873 came into force) sole legal owner, or he may have only an equitable estate. The legal estate must of course be conveyed to him by one of the ordinary modes of conveyance applicable to freehold, leasehold, or copyhold estates. An equitable mortgage may be created by a mere agreement in writing, or even without writing by a deposit of the title-deeds by the legal owner. An equitable mortgagee must of course before Nov. 1, 1875, have resorted to the Court of Chancery and not to a Court of Law to assert his rights.

Passing now to the modes of acquiring rights of ownership or property over the soil in the sense above explained, the most convenient classification would appear to be—modes of acquiring rights of ownership at common law, including under this head the modifications in detail of the old common law conveyances by recent Statutes; modes of acquiring rights of

1 See above, p. 238.
2 27 and 28 Vict. c. 112, s. 1.
3 27 and 28 Vict. c. 112, s. 4.
4 Chap. V. §5 (2).
5 Williams on Real Property, p. 457.
6 See p. 261.
ownership under the Statute of Uses and the Statute 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106; and modes of acquiring such rights in equity.

(6) Modes of acquiring rights at common law have already been explained, and need here only be enumerated. The mode of acquisition is different according as the rights acquired are freehold, leasehold, or copyhold.

(7) The original mode of acquiring a freehold right of present enjoyment at common law is, as has been seen, by feoffment accompanied by livery of seisin, the requisites of which have already been detailed. It is needless however to say that this mode of conveyance, though still legal, is in practice obsolete. A feoffment was technically confined to an estate in fee simple, the conveyance of an estate tail by the same process was technically called a gift, that of an estate for life a lease.

To conveyances of freehold lands at common law may be added conveyances by way of exchange. An exchange is a mutual grant of equal interests in lands, the one in consideration for the other. Thus A may exchange his estate in fee simple of Blackacre with B's estate in fee simple of Whiteacre. This may be done by simple deed without livery of seisin.

Where there is a tenant of a particular estate he may at common law surrender his estate to the remainderman or reversioner by simple deed without livery of seisin. In the case of all the three assurances above mentioned, feoffment, exchange, and surrender, a writing signed by the conveying parties or their agents was made necessary by the Statute of Frauds, and the Statute 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106 requires a deed. These assurances, feoffment, exchange, and surrender, to which should be added partition, which has been already mentioned, appear

---

1 See above, Chap. III. § 12 (2).
2 Blackstone, ii. 325. By the Inclosure Act 1845, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 147, means of effecting exchanges, which have been found of much practical utility, were provided through the action of the Inclosure Commissioners.
3 29 Car. II. c. 3.
4 See above, p. 234.
to exhaust the possible modes of dealing with a freehold estate in possession at common law.

Freehold rights of future enjoyment, though, as has been seen in the fifth chapter, they can only be created by a common law conveyance by way of remainder, are habitually, when they exist, conveyed by conveyances operating at common law. For instance, an existing reversion or remainder can be conveyed to a stranger by grant, or to the tenant of the particular estate by release. Each of these transactions requires a deed.

(8) The modes of creating and conveying leasehold interests have already been discussed. A leasehold interest is created by a demise effected by appropriate words, the usual words being 'demise, lease, and to farm let,' followed by the entry of the lessee on the demised lands.

In the case of all leases for a term exceeding three years from the making of the lease, or where the rent does not amount to two-thirds of the full improved value of the land, the words of demise to be effectual must, by the provisions of the Statute of Frauds, be in writing. And by the Statute 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 106. s. 3, whenever a lease is required by law to be in writing it shall be void at law unless made by deed. A mere agreement for a lease is however in practice as efficacious as a formal lease, for the Court exercising a jurisdiction formerly confined to the Court of Chancery will order, if need be, that a formal lease should be executed.

If the formalities required by the Statute of Frauds and 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106 are not observed, the tenancy created by the demise and entry will be a tenancy at will. Tenancies from year to year, by the half-year, quarter, etc., are, as has been shown, modifications of tenancies at will. In these tenancies the interest of the tenant can only be terminated by

---

1 § 3. 2 See above, Chap. V. § 1. 3 29 Car. II. c. 3. §§. 1, 2. 4 It should be borne in mind that an agreement for a lease, being an interest in lands, is required by the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. II. c. 3. s. 4) to be in writing. 5 See above, p. 200.
 proper notice expiring at the end of the year of the tenancy, or at such other periods as may be contemplated by the parties. The other terms of the tenancy may be proved by parol or verbal evidence without writing. Thus a verbal agreement creating a tenancy for ten years, with elaborate provisions as to mode of cultivation, rights of lessor and lessee at the end of such term, and such-like, followed by entry of the lessee and payment of rent, will create a tenancy from year to year upon the terms specified, and similar terms may without any actual or express agreement be implied by the custom of the country.

Thus much for the mode of creation of leasehold interests. The term\(^1\) when created can be alienated by the lessee like any other right of property. He can do this either by way of underlease or assignment. An underlease is where a lessee makes a lease for a shorter term than he himself holds, leaving thereby a reversion, of however short a duration, in himself. In its legal attributes an underlease in no way differs from a lease.

The grant of the whole term by the lessee is called an assignment. The Statute of Frauds required such assignments to be in writing\(^2\). The act to amend the Law of Real Property renders a deed necessary for the completion of the legal title\(^3\). The assignee of the lease has the same interest as the lessee (his assignor). This extends even to the binding of the assignee to the lessor by some of the covenants relating to the land into which the lessee may have entered. As, for instance, a covenant by the lessee to pay the rent or to repair the demised premises will bind his assignee. The assignee succeeds therefore not only to his assignor's rights in rem, but to some of his rights and duties in personam. Of course every covenant entered into between the lessor and original lessee

---

1 It should be observed that the word 'term' applies not to the period of time, but to the interest itself. The 'term' may come to an end before the period for which the lease has been granted has expired.

2 Sect. 3.

3 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106. s. 3.
which does not 'touch and concern' the thing demised, or in other words, which does not appertain as an ordinary and natural incident to the relation of lessor and lessee, does not upon the assignment cast any burden or duty on the assignee towards, or confer any right upon him against, the original lessor. It is often a difficult question whether or not a covenant is so connected with the land as to run with it, i.e. bind each successive assignee of the land.

In like manner as the burden and the benefit of the last-mentioned class of covenants entered into by the lessee extend to the assignee of the term, so do the burden and the benefit of such covenants extend to the assignee (or grantee) of the reversion. Whether or not the assignee of the reversion could take advantage of or was bound by covenants running with the land as between himself and the lessee, or assignee of lessee, seems to have been a doubtful point until it was settled by a Statute of Henry VIII. Upon the dissolution of the monasteries there were many long leases subsisting of ecclesiastical lands. In order to place the grantees of the confiscated land in the same advantageous position as the ecclesiastical bodies by whom the leases had been made, it was necessary to provide that the assignee of the reversion should be enabled to take advantage of and should be bound by the covenants entered into by the lessor under whom he claims.

Leasehold interests are frequently terminated by an application of the doctrine of conditions noticed above. A lease usually contains a proviso for re-entry by the lessor in the event of the breach of any of the covenants entered into by the lessee, and also in certain other events, as for instance his bankruptcy. This proviso (subject to the restrictions on the right of re-entry contained in the Conveyancing and Law of

1 32 Henry VIII, c. 34.
2 Though the words of the enactment are general, the Courts have confined its provisions to covenants which touch and concern the thing demised. See on the subject of covenants running with the land, Spencer's case, in Smith's Leading Cases, 5th ed., p. 43.
3 See p. 220.
Property Act, 1881) entitles the lessor on the happening of the specified event to enter, or to bring an action of ejectment, and so terminate the lease. If however the lessor, after knowledge of the happening of the event, continues in any way to treat the lessee as his tenant, as for instance by receipt of rent accruing after the forfeiture, he is said to waive the forfeiture, and can no longer take advantage of it. A lease may of course be made terminable in certain events, on the happening of which the lessor has a right to re-enter without any express proviso for re-entry. Such a proviso is however usually inserted.

(9) Modes of acquiring rights of the character of copyhold have already been dealt with. Except where the modern Statutes have altered in detail some of the solemnities requisite for the passing of copyhold lands, the general mode of alien-ating copyhold lands is by surrender and admittance operating at common law.

(10) Passing now from the modes of alienation which rest upon the common law, it is convenient to arrange in a distinct class modes of alienation operating under the Statute of Uses and under the Act to amend the Law of Real Property. The necessary forms of conveyance have been still further abbreviated and simplified by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, and the Conveyancing Act, 1882. This class will in fact comprise the whole body of conveyances in use at the present day. No simple alienation of an estate of freehold or settlement of lands is ever framed which does not

1 44 and 45 Vict. c. 41. § 8. 14. The principal of these are, that the right of re-entry is not to be exercised unless and until the lessor serves on the lessee a notice specifying the breach complained of, and, if the breach is capable of remedy, requiring the lessee to remedy the breach, and in any case requiring the lessee to make compensation in money for the breach, and the lessee fails to remedy the breach or to make compensation. These restrictions do not extend to covenants or conditions against underletting or assigning, conditions for forfeiture on bankruptcy or taking in execution the lessee’s interest, or on non-payment of rent.

2 See above, Chap. V. § 6, pp. 248, 251.

3 44 and 45 Vict. c. 41, and 45 and 46 Vict. c. 39.
owe its operation to the enactments of one or both of the first-named Statutes. The operation of the Statute of Uses upon a feoffment to uses, bargain and sale, and covenant to stand seised, has already been sufficiently discussed in the seventh chapter. The practical application of the Statute combined with the common law conveyance of a release has been explained, and it has been seen how the long prevalence of the mode of conveyance by lease and release was at length superseded by the provisions of the Act to amend the Law of Real Property. That Statute abolished the ancient principle that freehold estates in possession could only be conveyed from one person to another by livery of seisin, and enacted that 'all corporeal hereditaments shall, as regards the conveyance of the immediate freehold thereof, be deemed to lie in grant as well as in livery.' The effect of this Statute therefore is to enable an effectual conveyance of a freehold estate in possession to be made by the operation of a simple deed containing words expressing a grant from the grantor to the grantee. This enactment does not in any way supersede the action of the Statute of Uses, and uses consequently may be and constantly are created by proper expressions in these deeds of statutory grant.

(11) The creation and disposition of Equitable rights have also been dealt with. It has been seen that these interests are created either by express words, that is, by the use of words in a conveyance operating to pass the estate at common law and creating a second use or trust not executed by the Statute, or by words imposing some active duty upon the alienee at common law; or secondly, they

---

1 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106. s. 2.
2 See the specimen of a modern grant of an estate in fee in Williams on Real Property, p. 201, where the operative words are—'be the said AB doth by these presents grant unto the said CD and his heirs all that messuage etc., to have and to hold unto and to the use of the said CD his heirs and assigns for ever.'
3 This is the case for instance in every marriage settlement of real estate. See above, p. 313.
4 See above, Chap. VII. § 4.
CH. X. § 1. may be created by implication, as upon a conveyance without consideration, in which case a resulting trust may be implied, or upon an agreement for the sale of lands uncompleted by conveyance and payment by the purchaser of the purchase money, in which case the vendor or legal owner becomes trustee for the purchaser.

For the conveyance and assignment of these equitable interests the only necessary solemnity is the writing required by the Statute of Frauds, though in practice it is usual to employ a deed.

(12) To pass now from alienation inter vivos to alienation by will. A will of lands operates on different principles according as the interest to be conveyed is freehold, leasehold, or copyhold.

(13) In regard to freehold lands the requisites of a valid will have already been detailed. When a will has been validly executed and remains in force at the death of the devisor, it operates immediately upon that event to convey the freehold lands comprised in the devise to the devisee. Though no act of acceptance or assent is necessary on the part of the devisee, yet if before acceptance by entering on the lands the devisee by an express act waives the devise, no estate will pass to him by the will.

(14) It should be observed that the operation of a will with regard to leasehold interests or chattels real is wholly different from its operation with regard to freeholds. For reasons already explained, leasehold interests are regarded as personal property. The whole of a man’s personal property is cast by the will upon his executors, and the legatees take their gifts through the medium of the executors. If therefore A devises all his estate real and personal to B, the freehold lands will vest in B immediately on A’s death, the leaseholds not until he has obtained the assent of the executors.

1 See Townson v. Tickell, 3 Barnewall and Alderson’s Reports, p. 31.
2 Chap. III. § 17; V. § 1.
SUCCESSION.

(15) The mode of devise applicable to copyholds has already been noticed.

§ 2. Title by Succession.

The second of the principal heads under which Titles may be arranged is Succession or devolution ab intestato. Here again the rules governing succession to interests in lands are different in the case of succession to freehold, leasehold, and copyhold interests.

(1) Descent of an Estate of Inheritance in Fee Simple in Freeholds. The old rules as to title by descent were in some important points modified and recast by the Act for the Amendment of the Law of Inheritance, which applies to descent on the death of any person subsequently to December 31, 1833. The main features of the existing law and the points in which the law was changed by the above-mentioned Statute will now be briefly noticed.

Upon the death of a tenant in fee simple the lands descend to his 'heir.' In ascertaining who the 'heir' is, the first question is, from whom is the descent to be traced? Formerly the rule was that the descent was to be traced from the person last actually seised. Thus suppose A, tenant in fee simple, has a son B and a daughter C by a first wife, and a son D by a second wife, and dies intestate, leaving B, C, and D surviving, if B entered and was seised of the lands, he thereby became a fresh stock of descent, and on his death, intestate, the land descended to his sister C to the exclusion of D his half-brother, the old rule being that there could be no descent to any one who was not of the whole blood of the

---

1 See above, pp. 343, 346.
2 See above, Chap. II. § 6.
3 & 4 Will. IV, c. 106.
4 The word 'heir' in English law has a sense far more limited than the word 'haeres' in Roman law. The 'heir' is the person on whom the real estate of a deceased intestate devolves. He is opposed to the devisee who is the person to whom real property is left by will, and to the executor or administrator who succeed to the personal estate. In Roman Law the 'haeres' is the universal successor to the deceased, whether ab intestato or ex testamento.
person last seised. On the other hand, if $B$, though he had survived $A$, had never entered or become seised of the lands, the lands would at $B$’s death have descended to $D$, for he being a son would be the heir of the person last seised, his father, in preference to his half-sister. The first of the above cases is that to which the old maxim ‘possessio fratris facit sororem esse heredem’ applies. It thus became an important question, under the old law, whether the person last entitled had ever obtained actual seisin. The Inheritance Act, 1833, has altered the law in this respect, by providing that descent in every case shall be traced to the last purchaser, that is to say, to the person ‘who last acquired the land otherwise than by descent.’ For example, in the case above given, it would be immaterial under the present law whether or not $B$ ever became seised of the lands. The important question after the deaths of $A$ and $B$ would be, not who was heir to $B$, but who was heir to $A$ (assuming him to have been the last purchaser). In the event of a total failure of the heirs of the purchaser, but not of the person last entitled to the land, it is provided by a later Statute, that in such a case the lands should descend to the heir of the person last entitled. For instance, $A$, a bastard, purchases

1 See below, p. 378.

2 3 and 4 Will IV, c. 106. § 1. By this section the person last entitled to the land shall be deemed the purchaser unless it shall be proved that he inherited it. The Real Property Commissioners (1st Report, p. 16) proposed that the person last entitled should be the stock of descent. The existing rule appears to have been adopted by the legislature in conformity with the authorities, especially Sir E. Coke. ‘And note that it is an old and true maxim in law, that none shall inherit any lands as heir but only the blood of the first purchaser.’ Coke upon Littleton, 124a. This rule, however, does not appear in Glanvil; see above, Chap. II. § 6; and Bracton, fol. 63 b, uses language which seems to be inconsistent with it, laying it down that a person on becoming seised makes a stipes or new stock of descent. Hence the maxim ‘seilina facit stipitem.’ Blackstone’s explanation of this rule of law, as well as his more elaborate explanation of the exclusion of the half-blood (see below), is based on the supposed strictly hereditary character of a feud, which Blackstone asserts was originally descendible only to the issue of the purchaser. This, however, does not appear to have ever been law in this country in the case of a gift to a man and his heirs. 22 and 23 Vict. c. 25. s. 19.
lands and dies intestate, whereupon the lands descend to his only child $B$. Upon $B$'s death intestate the lands would, but for the last-mentioned Act, have escheated. Since that Statute they will descend to the heir of $B$.

Starting then with the last purchaser as the stock of descent, the heir of the purchaser is first to be looked for in his own offspring, and, according to the well-known rule of primogeniture, will be found in the first instance in the eldest of the purchaser's sons. Stated generally, the rule is that, amongst persons of equal degree in relation to the purchaser, males are entitled one after another in the order of their birth, females take together as coparceners$^1$.

But before a younger brother or daughters can claim as heir to the last purchaser in consequence of the decease of a brother who would have been entitled to succeed, it must be ascertained that the elder or only brother has left no lawful descendants. For it is an invariable rule that such children stand in the place of their parent, and succeed to the rights which he would have had if he had survived the purchaser. Thus if $A$ is the purchaser and has two sons $B$, the elder, and $C$, $B$ has a son $D$ who has issue two daughters $E$ and $F$, $B$ and $D$ predecease $A$, upon the death of $A$ intestate the lands descend to his great-grand-daughters to the exclusion of his son $C$.

If the purchaser at his decease leaves no children or descendants surviving him, the lands will go to his nearest male lineal ancestor, the paternal line being preferred to the maternal$^2$.

This rule was newly introduced by the Inheritance Act. By a strange anomaly in our law, of which no satisfactory explanation appears to have been given, the lineal ancestor was formerly excluded from the succession, though the uncle

---

$^1$ As to coparceners see above, Chap. V. § 4. See for a discussion of the proper rule in the case where $A$ purchases lands and dies intestate leaving two daughters $B$ and $C$, and $B$ afterwards dies intestate leaving a son $D$, Williams on Real Property, Appendix B.

$^2$ 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 106, ss. 6, 7.
or aunt was not\(^1\). If such ancestor has predeceased the purchaser, his issue will represent him in the same order, and subject to the same rules (with one exception) as have been already stated with regard to the issue of the purchaser.

Formerly, on the death of a tenant in fee intestate and without issue, the father being excluded, the lands descended at once to the next brother, or, if no brother, to the sisters.
Now the brother or sisters succeed as representing the father of the purchaser, the uncles, aunts, and first cousins as representing the grandfather, and remoter collaterals as representing the common ancestor\(^2\).

In collateral descent the principle of simple representation according to the rules governing the descent to the purchaser’s lineal descendants is, as has been said, subject to one exception.
There was an unreasonable rule under the older law which excluded entirely persons of the half-blood of the person last seized from the succession\(^3\). Thus, to refer to the instance

\(^1\) The elaborate explanation given by Blackstone, ii. pp. 211, 212, referring the rule to feudal principles, and to the supposed rule that a feudum necovm or newly-granted feu d could only descend to the lineal descendants of the feoffee
(see ib. p. 222), appears to be inconsistent with the early English authorities, which do not mention any such fiction as Blackstone supposes to be necessary to explain collateral succession. I am disposed to think it more probable that the rule really results from the associations involved in the word ‘descent,’ and that the rule ‘an inheritance may lineally descend but not ascend’ (Littleton, sect. 3) was supposed to be part of the law of nature. Compare Bracton, fol. 63 b: ‘Descendit itaque jus, quasi ponderosum quid cadens decusum, recta linea vel transversali, et quandam reascendit ea via qua descendit.’

\(^2\) See 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 106, s. 5.

\(^3\) The rule as laid down by Bracton (65) appears to be of a much more limited character. Where a man leaves issue by two wives, \(A\) a son and \(B\) a daughter by the first and \(C\) a son by the second, and \(A\) purchases lands and dies intestate, the lands descend to \(B\) in preference to \(C\). Bracton mentions that it was a disputed question whether the same rule applied when the lands had descended from the common father. In that case he seems to think the lands ought to descend from the eldest son to the younger brother of the half-blood to the exclusion of the sister. Blackstone’s explanation of the exclusion of the half-blood is probably the most unsatisfactory passage in his given above, if $A$ died, leaving $B$ a son and $C$ a daughter by a first wife and $D$ a son by a second wife, and $B$ became actually seised of the lands and died, the lands would descend to $C$ the sister and not to $D$. Again, if $C$ became seised and died intestate, $D$ could not be her heir, and if she left no relation of the whole blood, the lands would escheat to the lord. By the change effected by the Inheritance Act, the half-blood, if descended from a common male ancestor, is to take next after any relation in the same degree of the whole blood. Thus, in the instance above given, assuming $B$ to be the last purchaser, $D$ will take next after his sister $C$. If the common ancestor is a female the half-blood will take next after the common ancestor\(^1\).

If there are no male ancestors of the last purchaser or representatives of such ancestors surviving at the time of his decease, the lands will in the next instance go to the female paternal ancestors of the purchaser. In this case the rule is that the mother of his more remote male paternal ancestor and her descendants are to be preferred to the mother of a less remote male paternal ancestor or her descendants\(^2\). It is difficult to see on what principle such a remote relation as might be embraced under this rule should be preferred to the purchaser's mother, but such is the law.

It is only after the failure of the paternal line of ancestors, both male and female, and their descendants, that the mother succeeds. After the mother come her descendants by another husband if any, and then her father and the line of male maternal ancestors of the purchaser and their descendants, according to the principles above stated; and last of all the line of female maternal ancestors and their descendants, who succeed according to the same rule as relates to female paternal ancestors\(^3\).

There are some cases of descent by particular customs of freehold lands where the old Anglo-Saxon rules still prevail.

\(^{1}\) 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 106, s. 9.  \(^{2}\) Sect. 8.  \(^{3}\) Sect. 8.
The most important of these are in the tenures called gavelkind and borough English, which have already been noticed.

(2) The succession to leasehold interests or chattels real rests on a wholly different ground. Here the fundamental distinction between real and personal property becomes important. On the death of a person entitled to a term of years in lands, the property devolves upon the administrator, or person appointed by the Probate Division of the High Court to administer the personal estate of the intestate. The administrator, after payment of the debts of the deceased, must distribute the personal property, including chattels real, according to the provisions of the Statute of Distributions.

(3) Descent in the case of copyhold lands is regulated by the particular custom of the manor in which the lands are situate. These may or may not follow the rules relating to freehold lands; and in order to ascertain the custom recourse must be had to the proper evidence, which is, primarily, the court rolls of the manor.

3. Miscellaneous Titles.

(1) Escheat.

If in the case of freehold lands there is a total failure of heirs on the death of the tenant, the land escheats to the lord. The theory of title by escheat is that the whole property in the land being, as has been said, divided

1 See above, pp. 46, 47.
2 Under the provisions of 20 and 21 Vict. c. 77.
3 22 and 23 Car. II, c. 10.
4 See above, Chap. V. § 6. How far the provisions of the Inheritance Act apply to copyhold or customary tenures is a matter somewhat disputed. The term 'land' is expressly interpreted to cover these tenures, but the Courts of Exchequer and Exchequer Chamber held that they do not affect a custom to trace descent to the person last seised. Muggleton v. Barnett, 1 Hurlstone and Norman, 282; 2 H. 653; and see Williams on Real Property, Appendix A.
5 See above, Chap. II. § 5.
between the lords (paramount and mesne) and the tenant, on the tenant failing to have any heirs to whom the lands can descend, there is a species of reversion to the next lord. His right over the land becomes as it were enlarged by the failure of the tenants in possession. But this title must be completed by entry on the land, or otherwise asserting his right.\(^1\)

If, as is usually the case at the present day, there is no known mesne lord of whom the land is held, the land escheats to the sovereign as lord paramount. The practice is for the Crown to institute an ‘inquest of office,’ usually before commissioners appointed for the purpose, in order to determine whether the tenant died without leaving an heir. On the verdict of the jury to this effect the Crown becomes seised of the land without the necessity of entry.\(^2\)

Escheat formerly took place upon the blood of the tenant being attainted. Here again we have a specimen of the practice of treating metaphorical expressions as if they were realities, which has been found to be so common amongst lawyers. Attaint took place upon judgment of death or outlawry being passed after conviction for treason or felony.\(^3\)

The effect of attaint was, as is said, to corrupt the blood so as to render it no longer inheritable. The effect was the same therefore as if the tenant had died without heirs; the land at once escheated to the lord. This escheat was however subject to the paramount right of the Crown, based on other than feudal principles, to forfeiture of the land, in the case of conviction for treason for ever, in the case of conviction for felony for a year and a day.

The notion of corruption of blood consequent on attaint was pushed still further. Not only did it apply to lands in the possession of the criminal at the time, but it extended

---

1 Blackstone, ii, p. 245. This necessity for the lord to do some act on his part induced Blackstone to class escheat under title by purchase.

2 Blackstone, iii, p. 260.

3 Blackstone, iv, pp. 383-387.
also to land to which he might afterwards become entitled. Thus if A were seized in fee, and B his eldest son were convicted of treason in A's lifetime, B having a son C, upon A's death intestate the land escheated to the lord, whether B were dead or not—if he were alive, because his blood being attainted he could not inherit; if he were dead, because C could not make title through him 1.

Such was formerly the law with reference to escheat propter delictum tenentis. After considerable modifications by statute of the doctrine of attainer 2, the recent Statute 33 and 34 Vict. c. 23 has totally abolished forfeiture and escheat (except when forfeiture is consequent upon outlawry), and provides instead for the appointment of an administrator to the property of the convict, and for the vesting of his property in such administrator during the continuance of his punishment.

(2) Loss and Acquisition by Lapse of Time.

The mode of acquisition by prescription of the class of rights over land which are styled above 'rights in alieno solo' has already been noticed. In the case of rights of ownership occupation without title for a certain period has an operation somewhat different in point of law. The theory of English law is that if a person entitled to a legal remedy against a wrong-doer does not pursue that remedy within a certain time after he has first had the opportunity of doing so, his right to pursue the remedy at all is extinguished 3. If therefore a person occupies land without any right, and the true owner or his successors in title allow twelve years 4 to elapse

1 Blackstone, ii. p. 254, says, 'The channel which conveyed the hereditary blood from his ancestors to him is not only exhausted for the present, but totally dammed up and rendered impervious for the future.' This effect of attainer was abolished by the Inheritance Act, 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 166, s. 10.
2 Especially by 54 Geo. III, c. 145.
3 See for the older law, Blackstone, iii. pp. 178, 188, 192, 196.
4 See 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 27, s. 2, and 37 and 38 Vict. c. 57. The latter Statute came into force on Jan. 1, 1879, and substituted the periods mentioned in the text of twelve, thirty, and six years for the former periods of twenty, since the last time when such owner or some person through whom he claims was in possession or receipt of the profits of the land, or of the rent, without taking effectual steps, by action or re-entry, to recover the land, the right to take such steps either by way of action or re-entry as against the occupant, or any person claiming through him, is extinguished. This rule is subject to exception in the case of persons who are disabled by infancy, coverture, or lunacy, from taking the proper steps to assert their right. Such persons, or persons claiming through them, though the twelve years may have elapsed, are allowed six years (unless the whole period amounts to more than thirty years) after the removal of their disability, or after the death of the person disabled. And if the occupant have given to the true owner an acknowledgment in writing, signed, of his title to the land, the period of twelve years begins to run anew from the date of any such acknowledgment. Thus for all practical purposes the effect of the above-stated rules is to make occupation without title for twelve years (subject to the exceptions already noticed) equivalent to a mode of acquiring a right. Such an occupant would before the Statute of Limitations have been safe from attack by entry or action at the hands of the true owner or any third party. And now the Statute of Limitations contains a provision that not only the right of action shall be barred by the lapse of twelve years, but the right of property itself shall be extinguished. For all practical purposes therefore it may be said that by possession without title for twelve years the occupant now acquires an estate in fee simple in the forty, and ten respectively. These are the Statutes of Limitations at present in force with regard to the rights over land called corporeal hereditaments (see above, p. 262, n. 2) and rents. They do not apply to the lands of the Crown or of the Duchy of Cornwall. The period of limitation with regard to such lands is sixty years. 9 Geo. III, c. 16; 23 and 24 Vict. c. 53; 24 and 25 Vict. c. 62.

1 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 27, ss. 16, 18, 19. The disability arising from absence beyond the sea was removed by 37 and 38 Vict. c. 57, s. 4.
2 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 27, s. 17.
3 Ib. s. 14.
4 Ib. s. 54.
lands¹, as against all persons except one whose right of entry or action has not existed for that period².

(3) Compulsory Acquisition for Public Purposes.

There are certain modes of acquiring land by what may be called a process of involuntary alienation, where the law provides means for depriving a person of his property upon proper compensation being made to him, and vesting it in other persons, or in a corporation, notwithstanding any opposition by the owner. Thus the legislature provides machinery for compelling persons to divest themselves of lands which may be required for certain purposes of public utility; for instance, a railway, public elementary schools, or certain public works. This is principally effected by the machinery provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act³. This Act contains a set of general provisions, which are usually incorporated in the special Acts authorising and regulating

¹ It should be observed that the mode of acquiring 'corporeal hereditaments' by lapse of time differs essentially in principle from acquisition of 'incorporeal hereditaments' by prescription. In the latter case, as has been shown above (Chap. III. § 18), long-continued enjoyment as of right was regarded as evidence of a grant by some owner of the praedium serviens. The Prescription Act, operating upon this state of the law, made long-continued enjoyment, as of right, a positive mode of acquiring the right. The mode of acquisition of corporeal hereditaments, treated of in the text, has been reached by another road, highly characteristic of the practical character of English law. By extinguishing all possible remedies, the right of the occupant is made impregnable, and unlike Roman law, or our own law of prescription, nothing but the bare fact of possession without title for a sufficiently long period is necessary to create the negative title resulting from the Statute of Limitations. The conditions required by the civil law, bona fides, justa causa, justus titulus, &c., have no place in our law.

² Observe that if the occupancy began during the continuance of a particular estate, the period of limitation does not begin to run against the remainderman or reversioner till his estate vests in possession (see above, p. 215). For instance, if lands have been given to A for life, remainder to B in fee, and during A's life C wrongfully obtains possession, as against A the period of limitation will begin to run from the commencement of C's possession, but as against B, not till the death of A, for not till then can B enter or bring ejectment. Contra non valentem agere non currit praescriptio.

³ 8 Vict. c. 18.
individual undertakings, providing for a mode of compulsorily vesting the property required in the company or other body undertaking the public works by the giving certain notices, and taking the requisite steps to assess and pay the proper compensation for the lands taken.

(4) Acquisition under Inclosure Acts.

The legislature has also provided special means for acquiring and divesting rights over common and waste lands. The limits within which the lord might by himself exercise his rights of ownership over the land have already been noticed.\(^1\)
Of course a ‘common’ might always be dealt with, as any other piece of property, by the concurrence of all the persons having rights over it, that is to say, by the concurrent action of the freeholder or lord of the manor and all the commoners.
But owing to the practical impossibility of obtaining the consent of all the commoners, it became usual for the legislature to pass private Acts of Parliament, authorising inclosures in particular places, and providing compensation to the lord and the commoners for the rights of which they were deprived, usually by giving them the benefit of the exclusive ownership of a portion of the soil of the common discharged of rights of common, in lieu in the former case of the seignory of the whole, and in the latter of the rights of common which were extinguished.

The Inclosure Acts, of which the Statute 8 and 9 Vict.
c. 118 is the most important, contain provisions for carrying out inclosures through the Inclosure (now the Land) Commissioners. The consents of the requisite number of persons interested in the land, and of the lord of the manor, must be obtained. If the inclosure is carried out, the Commissioners may award certain portions of the waste for recreation, for allotments to the labouring poor, and for roads; the residue is divided amongst the persons who previously had rights

\(^1\) Chap. III. § 18 (4).
CH. X. § 3 (4).

over the land, and the lord of the manor. Upon the allotment being made, the common or other rights enjoyed over the land previous to the inclosure are extinguished.

The land allotted to the various persons who already were the owners of adjoining lands becomes part of and is held by the same tenure as the lands to which it is annexed: if annexed to freeholds, the land becomes freehold, and is held for the same estate as the land to which it is annexed; if the adjoining land is copyhold, the annexed land becomes copyhold also.

(5) Compulsory Enfranchisement of Copyholds.

Another species of compulsory alienation takes place under the Acts by which either a lord of a manor or a copyhold tenant is entitled to compel enfranchisement through the medium of the Land (formerly the Copyhold) Commissioners. Enfranchisement, as has been seen, consists in the conveyance of the freehold by the lord to his copyhold tenant. Either lord or tenant may now under the provisions of the above-mentioned Acts obtain an award of enfranchisement, compensation in money paid down or secured, or in land, being awarded to the lord.

(6) Bankruptcy.

Estates in land are lost and acquired by the bankruptcy of the tenant. Upon the appointment of the trustee in bankruptcy under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the whole of the bankrupt's freehold, leasehold, and copyhold estates vest in the trustee, in trust for the creditors.

The following table shows in a concise form the classification of modes of acquisition which has been presented in this chapter.

---

1 8 and 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 106.
2 15 and 16 Vict. c. 51; 21 and 22 Vict. c. 94.
3 See above, p. 250.
4 46 and 47 Vict. c. 52.
Table IV.

Titles or Modes of Acquisition of Rights over Things Real.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>§ 1. Alienation.</th>
<th>§ 2. Succession or Devolution.</th>
<th>§ 3. Miscellaneous.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>(1) Inter vivos.</td>
<td>(1) Of Freeholds.</td>
<td>(12) By Will.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(13) Of Freeholds.</td>
<td>(2) Of Leaseholds.</td>
<td>(14) Leaseholds.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(15) Copyholds.</td>
<td>(2) Of rights of ownership.</td>
<td>(3) Of rights in alieno solo.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Express Grant, Implied Grant, Prescription.</td>
<td>Erga莫, Mortgages (legal and equitable).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(11) In Equity.</td>
<td>(1) Escheat.</td>
<td>(2) Lapse of time.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(6) Bankruptcy.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
GLOSSARY.

The Glossary aims only at giving the senses in which words occurring in the previous extracts, with which the reader might probably not be familiar, are there used.

A.
Acquiescere, to release or acquit, p. 77.
Aesmecia, right of prior birth, primogeniture, 56.
Approvare, appruare, 170, to approve, i.e. to make profit of the waste by enclosure. See s.v. "approve" in the "New English Dictionary" (edited by Dr. Murray), where the word is traced to an old French word a-prurer.
Arbelastarius, a cross-bowman, 72.
Arramare, to undertake, especially to undertake the prosecution or defence of a suit, 161 (see Spelman, Glossary, s.v. adranaire).
Arura, a ploughing, 120.
Assartare, to clear a space in a wood, 170.
Assartum, a clearing, 161.
Assignare, to assign, make over, 137.
Assisa, (1) a law, ordinance, or statute, 95; (2) a particular species of suit, so called, apparently, because instituted by an assisa, 160; (3) the jurors in an assize, 162.

Attaintus = attinctus, attained, the peculiar consequence of a conviction for treason or felony.
Attornare, to appoint a substitute or attorney for the conduct of a suit, 91; to cause a tenant or farmer to recognise as lord the alienage of the freeholder, 147.
Averia, animals used in agriculture, especially commonable beasts, 160.

B.
Ballivus, a steward or bailiff, 159.
Bladum, corn, 165.
Boscus, woodland, 161.
Bovata, an ox-gang, as much land as one ox (or a pair of oxen) could till in a year, variously estimated at 13-18 acres, but probably an indefinite quantity, 91.
Brevuare, a writ or command in writing, especially a writ by which an action was commenced, 70.
Breviuncula, a writing or charter, 59.
Brochis, a brooch or needle for fastening a sack, 121.
Brexels, thorns or rough bushes, 160; rough ground, 170.
Burgassium, burgensis, see Index, Burgage.

C.
Capitalis, chief; capitalis dominus, lord of a manor, 132.
Caraxare, to sign, 59.
Caruca, caruca, a plough, 104.
Carucata, a plough-land, as much land as could be cultivated by a plough in one year, varying probably with the character of the soil, but larger than the bovata, 72.
Cataalla, chattels, moveable or personal property, 83.
Census, income from land, rent, 77.
Chacesa, a way for driving cattle, a drove, 163.
Clamanitia, 91, clameum, 185, claim.
Clamare, to complain, 70; to claim, 71.
Clamor, complaint, 72.
Clausum Paschae, the close of the octave or utas of Easter, the Sunday after Easter, 96.
Comes, an Earl, 57, 72.
Comitatus, county, 171; County-Court, 71.
Communis, see Index, Common.
Compendium, a shorter way, 154.
Comportum, compotus, account, 80.
Commodia, a settlement or compromise of a cause in court, applied to a fine, 90.
Conquestus, the conquest or acquisition of England by William I, 122, 130.
Consideratio, a judgment (of a Court), 75.
Constitutio, (1) an ordinance or law, 161; (2) a mode of constituting a right, especially the grant by which a servitude is created, 151.
Consuetudo, a custom, especially customary feudal dues, 123.
Convenio, a covenant or agreement by deed, 129, 146.
Convincere, to convict, 83.
Coterelli, see Index.
Curia, (1) court, Curia Regis, etc.; (2) a court or yard, 159.
Curialia verba, ordinary every-day language (?), 68.
Custodia, wardship, see Index.
Custumarii, see Index.
Custus, cost, 72.

D.
Damna, (damnus, 115), damages, 147.
Defalca, default, 177.
Defensione, enclosures, 159.
Deforcio, -ceo, to keep out by force, 71.
Demanda, a demand, that which is demanded, 123.
Desicere, although, 161.
Devisa, or divisa, the division of the property of a deceased person in accordance with his will, hence devise, 93 n.
Dimittere, to demise, let, or lease lands for life or years, 146.
Diractionare, to establish, usually applied to establishing a superior title, and disproving title of tenant, 75, 82.
Disparagatio, degradation by an unequal marriage, 106.
Disseisin, disseisin, see Index.
Disseisire, to put out of seisin, 96.
Districtio, distraint, compelling to performance of a duty by lawful seizure of property, 78.
Distringere, to distraint, 78.
Dominium, dominion, or demesne, the possession of the freehold, 133; domain of the lord of a manor, 169.
Donatorius, donee, the person to whom an estate is given, 125.

E.
Eleemosyna, see Index, Frankalmoin.
Emenda, amends, properly a compensation to party injured, as opposed to a fine, 123.
Escota, eschat, see Index.
Escambium, that which is given in exchange or substitution, especially the land which a lord bound to defend his tenant's title must give in recompense if the tenant be ousted by virtue of a superior title, 72; see Index, Warranty.

Estoverium, 'stuff,' i.e., wood or other materials which the tenant is entitled to take from the land of his lord or a stranger for repairs, fuel, etc., 160.

Exemptio, a plea, formal statement of matter of excuse to an action, 80.

Exhaereditare, to deprive of estate in lands, 83.

Exhaereditatio, disinheritance (by alienation by tenant in his lifetime), 89, 192.

Exitus, issues, profits, 103.

Expeditatio (canum), mutilation of the foot to prevent a dog chasing game, 171.

Expeditio, the duty of military service, see Index, Trinoda necessitas.

Expletia, 127, oples, 201, fruits or produce of land.

F.

Facio, the service of reaping or cutting corn, etc., 120.

Felonis, felony, crimes other than treason punishable with forfeiture and escheat of land and goods, 83.

Feodalis (feodalia servitutis, 120), services attaching as an incident of tenure.

Feodifirma, feu-farm, see Index.

Feodum, fee, see Index.

Fidelitas, fealty, see Index.

Fines, (1) a fine (pecuniary), 102; (2) a fine (final concord); see Index.

Firmarius, farmer, an occupier of land for years or other limited period who has no freehold interest, 145.

Forossecus servitutis, services due to the king as lord paramount, as opposed to services due to the immediate lord, 121.

Forisfascere, 34 s., Forisfictura, 83, to forfeit, forfeiture.

Foris-familiae, (apparently) to deprive a son of a right of succession to lands by his accepting lands from the father in his lifetime, 86.

Fossatum, a bank, 162.

G.

Gardinem, gardinus, a garden, 159.

Guerra, war, 78.

H.

Haspa, hasp, handle (of door), 127.

Hays, hedge, 162.

Heriot, heriot, see Index.

Hida, hide, see Index.

Homagium, homage, see Index.

I.

Imbreiare, to enrol (names of jurors), 96.

Incurrire, incurri domino, to be forfeited to the lord, 177.

Inde, thereon, thereof, therefrom.

Intrinseca servitutis, services reserved by the feoffant or grant to the immediate lord, 120.

Irritare, to make void, 89.

J.

Justiciare, to exercise judicial authority over, compel by process of law, 78.

Justitia, a justice = justitiarius, 70.

K.

Legalis homo, a law-worthy man, one capable of possessing all legal rights, 96.

Leporarius, a greyhound (?), 120.

Ligeancia, the relation created by homage and fealty of a vassal to his chief lord, 74, 80.

Litere patentes, writings authenticated by a seal, whereby a man is enabled to do or enjoy that which otherwise of himself he could not. So called because they are open, ready to be shown for confirmation of the authority thereby given, 126; see Blount, Law Dict., s. v.
M.
Manerium, a manor, 121.
Mansa, see Index.
Mansuincula, a small house or tenement, 161.
Mariscus, a marsh, 161.
Maritagium, (1) marriage, i.e. the right of the lord to provide his tenant with husband or wife, or to receive the due equivalent, 107, 152; (2) the land given by a father to his daughter on her marriage (97) to be held by the tenure of (3) frank-marriage, 88; see Index.
Maritare, to marry, or provide with a marriage, 81.
Merchetum, the fine payable by a villein to his lord on the marriage of a daughter, 129, 171.
Messuagium, a house, messuage, 85.
Messura, the service of harvesting, 120.
Miles, a knight, 113; a tenant by knight-service, 84.
Militia, knight-service, 84.
Minister, thegn, 58.
Misericordia, (1) mercy, (2) a discretionary fine, in misericordia esse, to be in mercy, i.e. to be liable to be fined to the extent of the whole of the offender's property, 115.
Molendinum, a mill, 154.
Mora, heath-ground, moor, 170.
Mulieratus, a son born in wedlock (contrasted with a bastard of the same parents), 89.
Muto, a weathor, 159.
Mutar, to keep hawks in a muta, or moulding-house, 120.
N.
Nundiniae, market-tolls, 171.
O.
Oeps, use, 274.
P.
Pallacium, a palisade, 154.
Pannagium, right of feeding animals in woods on beechnut, acorns, etc., 170.
Pars, enclosure, park, 170.
Pargamen, parchment, 58.
Patria, a jury, 177; see Index.
Pessona, scorns, mast, etc. fallen from trees, 159.
Placitate, to bring a suit or action, 82.
Placitum, a plea or suit, 71, 79, etc.
Plegius, a surety, 91.
Praecoptum, a writ, a mandate under the royal seal; especially applied to the process by which an action is commenced, 70; sometimes called from the first word 'Praecipe,' 70; compare, 214.
Pratum, a meadow, or enclosed grass land, 164.
Q.
Questum, land purchased, opposed to land inherited, 89.
R.
Recognition, a mode of trial by calling in neighbours to take cognizance of the truth of disputed facts, 95.
Rectum (placitum de recto, breve de recto), 71, 72, a writ of right, the form of action devised for claiming the fee.
Redditus, rent; see Index.
Relevatio, relief, 77 n.
Releviare, to pay a relief, 77.
Relevium, relief; see Index.
Remanentia, permanence, perpetuity, 83.
S.
Scaccarium, Exchequer, 80.
Schedula, sheet, 58.
Secta, a following, attendance at court, 120; customers (of a miller), 154.
Seisin, seisin; see Index.
Seriancia, serjantoria, serjeanty; see Index.
Servitium, service; see Index, Services.
Servitus, a servitude, a right over land vested in some person other than the owner of the land, 151.
Socagium, socage; see Index.
Sokemannus, see Index, Socmanni.
Glossary.

Solicola, inhabitants, 98.
Solidus, a shilling, 24 n.
Summonitio, a summons, 70.

T.
Tulliarum, to tax, 129.
Tenementum, tenement; see Index.
Terminus, term; see Index.
Terrenus honoris, territorial dignity, the reverence with which a lord is treated by his tenant, 74.
Toftum, enclosure of a dwelling-house, 91.
Transfretatio, crossing the sea (from England to Normandy), 96.
Turba, turf for fuel, 160.
Turbaria, turf-ground, 170.

U.
Unde, whereof, wherefrom.

Utrago, to make an outlaw, 83.
Utragaria, outlawry, 83.

V.
Vadium, pledge, security, 96; mortgage, 142.
Valentia, value, 85.
Villa, see Index.
Villanagium, see Index.
Virgata, a yard-land, said to contain different quantities in various localities, (15-40 acres, Blount, Law Dict. s.v.) 95.

W.
Wainnagium, farming stock, peculium agricolae, 104.
Waraactum, fallow, 165.
Warrantia, warrantia, see Index, Warranty.
INDEX.

A.
Acceptance, p. 360.
Active duty, 325, 332.
Administration suit, 240.
Administrator, 198.
Admittance (of copyhold tenant), 249, 251.
Advowson, 171 n., 260.
Agricultural Holdings' Acts, 1875 and 1883, 200 n.
Alien, incapacity of, 361.
Alienation, 14, 28, 86-90, 114, 131-133, 137, 138-139, 389-393.
— restraint on, in favour of family, 14.
— of heir, 87-89.
— of lord, 114, 121, 179, 190.
— of king, 131.
— condition against, 132, 133.
— licence of, 132, 351, 353.
— title by, 358-375.
— inter vivos, 364-374.
— compulsory, for public purposes, 384.
Alieno solo, rights in, 261, 262.
— modes of acquisition of, 364-366.
Alodium, 9 n., 11, 13, 26, 46.
— conversion of, into feudum, 31.
Ancient demesne, 50 n., 130 n.
Anglo-Saxon law, 25.
— charters, 29, 55-59.

Appointment, power of, 318-322.
Appropinquation of commons under Statute of Merton, 115, 157, 161, 166.
— Statute of West, II, 163, 170, 186-189.
— at Common Law, 163.
Appurtenant servitudes, 14 § 1, 187, 157, 166.
Assets, 207.
Assignment, 370.
Assigns, 127.
Assistaum Liber, 227.
Assize, remedy by, 92-96, 115, 129.
151.
— of Northampton, 94.
— grand, 71, 95.
Attachment, 278.
Attainder, 381.
Attorney, 91 n.
Attornment, 147, 201, 216.
— abolition of, 218.
Avowry, 307 n.

B.
Bankruptcy, 386.
— Act, 1883, 238 n., 386.
Bargain and Sale, 284.
— effect of Statute of Uses on, 312.
— enrollment of, 313, 312-324.
Base fee, 180.
Bastard, 86, 89.
Battle, trial by, 71 n.
Beneficets, 30.
Bookland, 12. 13.
Bordarii, 24 n., 49-51.
Borough English tenures, 47, 85, 283.
Boroughs, customs of, 47.
Bracton, Henrichus de, his treatise, 100.
Britton, 167, 201.
Brooke’s Abridgment, 227.
Burgage tenure, 5, 47.
— custom of devise in, 47, 227, 333.

C.
Capite, tenant in, 29, 112, 122.
— mistaken use of term, 352 n.
Cestui que trust, see Trustees.
Cestui que use, 276, 281.
— conveyances of, made good, 301.
— position of, assimilated to legal owner, 302.
Cestui que vie, 136 n.
Chancellor, 185 n.
— early functions of, 276-278.
— growth of his judicial functions, 278, 279.
Chancery, Court of, 279-288, 324-330.
Charitable uses, 362.
Charter of feoffment, 122.
Chartellis real, 199; see Leasehold interests.
Chief, Teutoonic, position and functions of, 9.
Chirograph of fine, 90.
Chivalry, tenure in, 38.
— abolition of, 47, 48, 352.
Churches, acquisition of lands by, 12.
Circuit, 65, 98, 161.
Clergy, influence of, 2 n., 29.
Code Napoleon, 227.
Cognizance, 307 n.
Collaterals, descent to, 86, 378.
Comes, 20; see Princes.
Commendation, 26, 31.
Common, rights of, 115, 116, 155, 166, 186-189.
— of copyhold tenants, 158 n., 160, 248.
— in gross, 160.
— over enclosed lands, 160, 165.
Common, rights of, pur cause de vicinage, 156.
— disseisin of, 96, 157.
Common appurtenant, 157, 160, 186-189.
Commonable cattle, 156.
Common fields, 160, 165.
Common law, origin of, 33.
— meanings of, 64 n., 58, 198.
— deficiencies of, 279.
— modes of acquiring rights at, 368.
Common Pleas, Court of, 70, 91 n.
Commons, inclosure of, 157, 352.
Condition, 134, 135.
— estates upon, 220, 221, 241, 244, 267, 371.
— benefit of, can only be reserved to grantee or his heirs, 220, 231.
Conditional gifts, 134, 138-142, 178,
182, 249.
Conditional limitation, 220 n.
Conscientious obligation, 276.
Consideration, 284.
Continental feudality, 29-32, 35.
Contingent remainder, 221-231, 268.
— of freehold requires support of particular estate of freehold, 223, 239 n.
— liability to destruction, 224, 329 n.
— trustees to preserve, 314 n.
— alienation and devolution of, 224, 225, 247.
— Act to amend the law as to, 1877, 220 n., 222 n., 317, 318.
Continual claim, 325 n., 227.
Contract, a source of rights in persomam, 257.
Conventionis, 28, 49, 144.
Conveyancing and Law of Property
Act, 1881, 205 n., 244, 314 n., 340 n., 371, 372 n.
Conveyancing Act, 1882, 372.
Coparceners, 232, 326.
Copyhold, 51, 244-253.
— origin of, 128, 246.
— of frank tenure, 130 n.
— alienation of, 248, 251.
— by will, 252 n., 347, 375.
— descent of, 247, 380.
INDEX.

Copyhold, enfranchisement of, 250, 386.
Copyhold Commissioners, 250.
Corona, tenant at de, 118 n.
Corporation, 174.
Corporal hereditaments, 202 n.
Corruption of blood, 381.
Cotarii, Cotsettia, 24 n., 49, 50.
Coterelli, 171.
Count (narratio), 212 n.
County Court, 71.
Court, of lord, 15, 27.
— of manor, 5.
— of hundred, 8, 15, 27, 52.
Cour Baron, 15, 51-53.
— jurisdiction of, in case of writ of right, 69, 71.
Court Leet, 15, 51-54.
Court Rolls, 246.
Covenant, writ of, 128, 144, 146.
— running with land, 370, 371.
— with reversion, 371.
— to stand seised, 285, 313.
Crown, see King.
Cui in vita, writ of, 297, 299.
Curia Regis, 65-72.
Curtesy, tenant by the, 85 n., 142, 143, 184, 283, 319.
Custom, how distinguished from prescriptive, 149 n.
— local, 59, 67, 72, 116.
— of manors, 245, 247.
— of the country, 370.
— profit not claimable by, 150 n., 165 n.
Customary Court, 51, 54, 246.
Customary freehold, 248 n.
Customary law, 61, 67, 68.
Custumarii tenentes, 171.

D.

Damnum, how distinguished from injuria, 154.
Debts, see Creditors’ Rights.
Deed, 129 n.
— when necessary to create right, 149, 368-370.
Demise, words of, 198.
Demurrer, 331.

Descent, in Anglo-Saxon law, 27, 28, 46.
— in freeholds, 84-86, 370-380.
— how restricted to lineal descendants, 179, 180.
— in copyholds, 246, 380.
Destination du Père de famille, 355.
Devise, see Will.
Devisee, liability of, for debts of devise, 239, 342.
Dignities, 260.
Disclaimer, 361.
Dissaisin, 92.
— of rights in alieno solo, 96, 154, 157, 160.
Dissipatio, release to, 128 n.
Distress for rent in arrear, 194 n., 203.
Domain lands, 24, 49, 169.
Domesday Book, 37, 48.
Domesday of St. Paul’s, 24 n., 49.
Dominant tenement, 148.
Donis Conditionalibus, Statutum de, 182.
Dow, 87, 109, 139.
— jointure bars, 307, 308.
— mode of barring, 319.
— writ of, 110.
Duration of estate, 27, 60, 154, 265.
Duresse, 359.

E.

Easement, 147, 148 n., 150 n., 263, 364.
— positive, negative, 148, 153.
— implied grant of, 363.
— carries right to repair, 154.
Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction in case of will, 140.
Ejectio firmae, writ of, 144, 147.
Ejectment, action of, 95, 144, 199, 252 n.
Emblements, 204 n.
Emphytesia, 30, 226.
Enfranchisement of copyholds, 250, 386.
Enrolments, Statute of, 322-324.
Entails, evils of, 208.
— by custom, 249.
Entry, right of, 93, 347.
Entry, writ of, 94.
Equitable estate, 327-329.
— after Statute of Uses, 324-325.
— modes of acquisition of, 373, 374.
Equity, Courts of, see Chancery.
— follows law, 283, 326.
Equity of redemption, 242.
Equity of Statute, 206.
Escheat, 44, 60, 82, 83, 380-382.
Escouage, see Scutage.
Estate, in lands, conception of, 42, 59, 143, 227, 255.
— of inheritance, 27, 266.
— in fee simple, 59, 225.
— conditional, 139, 178, 179, 249.
— tail, 139, 178-186, 205-213, 266.
— for life, 28, 135.
— pur autre vie, 136.
— less than freehold, 266.
— for years, 135; see Leasehold interests.
— at will, from year to year, at sufferance, 145, 200, 201, 204, 369, 370.
Estovers, common of, 152.
Evidence, early notions of, 143 n.
— of interested witness, 336.
Exception, 141.
Exchange, 366.
Execution, 237.
Esceutory devises, 268, 320, 338.
Extents manuri, 169-173.

F.
Farmer, 49, 198; see Lessee.
Fealty, 31, 47, 74.
Fee, meanings of, 59, 70 n.
Fee farm, 104.
Felony, effect of conviction for, 85, 381.
Feeoffe to uses, 274, 276, 281, 310.
— liability of heir of, 282.
Feeoffment, 48.
— charter of, 60, 122, 123, 365.
— after Qua Qua Equestres, 194.
— to uses, 292.
Feoffor, Feoffee, 48.
Feoff assavoir, 168 n.
Feudal system, 33 n., 37.
Feudalism, 29-32.
Feudum, 31.

F.
Fidei-commissa, 273.
Fidei-kaesione, sui de, 272.
Fleri facias, writ of, 237.
Fine, on alienation, 42 n., 134, 345, 351, 355.
— on admittance of copyhold tenant, 245.
Fine of lands, 90, 91, 185 n.
Fines and Recoveries, Act for abolition of, 90, 210, 249.
Firmarii, 28.
Fixtures, 259 n.
Fleta, 167.
Folkland, 11.
— grants of, 12-15.
— possessory rights over, 15, 16.
— becomes terra regis, 18, 25, 28.
Forfeiture, 82, 83, 113, 381, 382.
— for breach of condition, waiver of, 372.
Forfeitures, after Conquest, 34.
Forinsec servitia, 121.
Forinseci tenentes, 170.
Former, writ of, 184.
Franchise, 15, 260.
Frankalmoign, 38, 119, 355.
Frank-marriage, 87 n., 183, 206.
Frank-pledge, view of, 54 n.
Frauds, Statute of, 123, 198, 319, 368.
Fraudulent conveyances, 362.
Fraudulent Devises, Statute of, 342.
Free services, 48, 117.
Fremench, 248 n.
Freehold cannot be in abeyance, 126, 219.
Freehold tenure, 48, 117, 134, 135.
French language, 168, 196.
Future enjoyment, rights of, in freeholds, 214-231, 268.
— rights of, created by way of use, 288, 313-322.
Future uses, 268, 288, 317.

G.
Gavelkind, 46 n., 142 n., 237, 259, 380.
Geburi, 24 n.
Gesith, 22.
Gift, technical sense of, 368.
 Gifts of chief to follower, 21, 30.
INDEX.

Glanvill, 66.
Glocester, Statute of, 199.
Grant, 216, 218, 268.
— of servitude, 150, 364.
— lost, 150, 365.
— made equivalent to livery, 312, 373.
Gross, rights in, 148, 158, 166.
Guardian in Chivalry, 78-80, 103-105, 351-353.
— in socage, 47, 79, 81, 355.
— power of father to appoint, 355.

H.
Habendum, 321.
Half-blood, 375, 376, 379.
Heir, meaning of term, 375.
— of devisee to, 347.
— when liable for ancestor’s debts, 239:
  see Descent.
Heirs, gift to a man and his, 124.
— customary, 246, 247.
— of body, 135, 205.
Heugham, 168 n.
Heriot, 39, 245.
Hide, 7 n, 9 n.
Homage, 37.
— definition of, 73.
— form of, 35, 74.
— of bishops, 75.
Homage, the, 246.
Honore, tenant ut de, 118 n.
Honour, 51.
Hundred, Teutonic division of host into,
  and connexion with territorial, 3.
Hundred-Court, see Court.
Husband, duties of, in respect of wife’s lands, 77, 82.
— rights of, over wife’s lands, 142, 143, 359.
— and wife considered as one person, 235.

I.
Idiot, see Lunatic.
Inclosure Acts, 158, 385.
Incorporeals hereditaments, 260, 362 n.
— modes of acquiring, 126, 364, 366.
Infangthof, 15.
Infant, conveyance by, 359.
Infant, conveyance to, 361.
Inhabitants, cannot as such claim profit by custom, 150 n, 165 n, 166 n.
Inheritance, words of, 58, 59, 137, 205, 240.
Inheritance Act, 84, 86 n, 375.
— changes effected by, 375-379.
Injurias, how differs from Damnenum, 154.
Injuries, rights arising from, 257.
Interesse termini, 198, 203.
Interruption of right, prevents prescription, 153 n.
Intrinseca servitutia, 120.
Investiture, 174.
Itinera, 65.

J.
Joint tenants, 231-234, 312.
Jointure, 387, 387, 388.
Judicature Acts 1873, and 1875, 44 n., 64 n.
Judicial records, 98, 117.
Judiciary law, 62, 65, 90, 116.
Jura in re aliensa, 147, 148, 226.
Jurisdiction, grants of, 14, 23 n., 51-53.
Jury, trial by, 95, 96, 125, 129, 177, 295.
Justices, 70.
Justiciar, 70.
Justices, writ of, 78 n.

K.
Kindred, rights of, 14.
King, his relation to the land, 9, 18, 25, 33-36.
— to thegns, 26.
— private property of, 14.
— growth of rights of, over unoccupied land, 18, 19, 168, 169.
— military service due to, 36, 117.
King’s Bench, Court of, 121 n.
Knight, 35, 38 n.
— aid for making lord’s son a, 40.
Knight’s fee, 35, 60 n, 72.
Knighthood compulsory, 350.
Knight-service, tenure by, 38-47,
  60 n, 117-122.
— abolition of, 349-356.
INDEX.

L.
Laenland, 16, 26 n.
Lammas lands, 7.
Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 384.
Language of law, 163, 196 n.
Lapse, 341.
Law, positive, sources of, 62.
— distinguished from custom, 62.
Lawing (of dogs), 173.
Lease, 368.
Lease and Release, 127 n., 145, 217.
— 222.
Leasehold interests, origin and history of, 49, 143–147, 197–204.
— descent of, 145, 198, 199, 380.
— devise of, 374.
— how created, 197, 198, 203, 369.
— uses of, 304 n., 326.
— underlease or assignment of, 370.
Legal Estate, 318.
Legislation, direct, judicial, 63.
Lessee, nature of interest of, 144, 145, 201.
Levant and cochant, of commonable beasts, 156.
Libera eleemosyna, see Frankalmoign.
Liberty, see Honour.
Liberum tenementum, 48, 119.
— estate for life, 59 n., 135.
Light and air, easement of, 148.
— 153 n., 261.
Limitation, words of, 57, 134, 137, 225.
— in wills, 339.
Limitation, period of, 93, 96, 382, 383.
Limitations, Statute of, title by, 383.
Limited interests, Anglo-Saxon, 57.
Littleton’s Tenures, 197.
Livery, see Ouster le main.
Livery of Seisin, see Seisin.
Lord, relation of, to man, 20, 37.
— of district or manor, 19, 23, 44.
— relation of, to inhabitants, 27.
Lordships, territorial origin and growth of, 19, 23, 24.
Lords, influence of great, upon legislation, 101, 102, 178, 190.
Lunatico, conveyance by, 359.
— conveyance to, 351.
— will of, 346.

M.
Magna Carta, 97, 101.
Magnum servitium, see Grand Seigniory.
Majority in different tenures, 79.
Manor, 43, 169–173, 244–249.
Manor Courts, 51–54, 246.
Mansion, 24, 43.
Maritigam, 87 n., 109, 183.
Mark System, 4–8.
Marriage, right of lord to, 41, 47, 81, 105–108, 118, 120, 351, 353.
— in socage, 47.
Married women, equitable estate of, 287, 330.
— alienation by, 296–299, 359.
— will of, 298, 347.
— husband may convey use to, 312.
— purchase by, 361.
Married Women’s Property Act, 1882, 287 n., 296, 320, 360.
Merchants, Statute of, 237.
MERCHANTM, 129.
Mergery, 217.
Mesne lord, 39.
Military service, 34, 38, 39, 118, 122.
Military tenure, 32, 35, 39, 117.
— abolition of, 349–356.
Mirror of Justice, 167.
Morning-gift, 109.
Mort d’Ancestr, Assize of, 93–95.
— equitable, 367.
INDEX.

Mortmain, licence to hold in, 175.
— evasion of provisions against, 272, 275.

N.
Norman Conquest, effects of, 32-35.
Norman law, 26.
Northampton, Assize of, 93.
Notoriosity, necessity for, 125, 218.

O.
Occasional, 136 n.
Office, inquest of, 362.
Offices, 260.
Ouster le main, 41, 351-353.
Outlawry, 83.
Ownership, conception of, 261, 265.
— acquisition of, 364.

P.
Patricius, matter in, 153 n., 295.
Paraphernalia, 298.
Pariceners, see Coparceners.
Pares curiae, 246.
Parish, 43.
Parishioners, supposed rights of, 8 n.
Parks, enclosure of, 162, 170.
Participes, 232.
Particular estate, 216, 218.
Partition, 334, 368.
Peers, 260.
Perpetuity, rule against, 320, 321.
Personal actions, 69.
Personal property, 259.
Personam, rights in, see Rights.
Petitions, reference of, to Chancellor, 277.
Piscatory, common of, 155.
Placita Anglo-Normanica, 99 n.
Placitum Abbreviatio, 99 n.
Pone, writ of, 71 n.
Positive law, 62, 67, 68.
Possessio, adaptation of Roman doctrine of, 123, 124.
— fratris, 376.
Possessory actions, 93.
Possibility, 181, 215, 224.
Power, see Appointment.

Prescription, 149-153, 366, 384 n.
— conditions of, 153, 155.
— how distinguished from custom, 149 n.
— in a quae estate, 157.
Prescription Act, 152, 153, 365, 366.
Present enjoyment, right of, 215.
Primer seisin, 42 n., 349-353.
Primiogeniture, 46, 84, 377.
Princes, relation of, to comes, 20-22.
Private law, 97, 255.
Private property in land, 5.
Procuration, words of, 175, 205.
Profit à prendre, 148, 265, 364.
— cannot be claimed by custom, 150 n.
Prohibition, 149 n.
Property, meanings of, 256.
Public land, 11.
Public law, 255, 256.
Purchase, words of, 137, 225.
Purchased land, alienation of, 89.
Purchaser, 376.
— liability of, to estui que use, 282.
— for valuable consideration, rights of, 363.

Q.
Quarantine, widow's, 110.
Quare ejector infra terminum, writ of, 199.
Quia Emptores, Statute of, 155, 159-165.
Quit rent, 248.

R.
Real actions, 69, 110.
— abolition of, 95.
Real property, 145, 259.
Realist philosophy, influence of, 267, 300, 326, 381.
Recognitio, trial by, 95.
Recognisance 238.
Redemption, equity of, 242.
Re-entry, condition of, 371.
Release, 145, 201, 217.
Relief, 39, 47, 76, 102, 103.
— in socage tenure, 47, 77.
Religious, Statutum de, 175-177.
Religious persons, incapacity of, 235.
Rem, rights in, see Rights.
Remainder, 135, 139 n., 140, 182, 218–231, 268.
— definition of, 218.
— freehold, conditions of, 218–220.
— vested, how distinguished from contingent, 221, 222, 268.
— of uses, 305, 317.
— see Contingent Remainder.
Rent, 46, 47, 265.
— of assize, 170.
— different kinds of, 194 n.
Reports, 65, 98, 167.
Resulting use, 284, 311.
— release of, to tenant, 145 n., 217.
— grant of, 147 n., 201, 217, 218.
— definition of, 215.
— tenure of, 206, 216.
Right, writ of, 69–72.
Rights, in rem, in personam, 143 n., 145 n., 216, 257.
— primary, secondary, or sanctioning, 257 n.
Rodknightes, service of, 120.
Rotuli Curiae Regis, 65, 99.

S.
Scarum, Council of, 35.
Scintilla juris, 327 n.
Scutage, 36, 111–113, 119.
Seal, use of, 56 n.
Seignory, 23 n., 49 n., 55.
Seisin, 49 n., 92, 147, 177.
Serjeantry, grand, 38, 354.
— petit, 48, 104, 121.
Servi, 49, 50.
Service, 37.
Services, kinds of, 71, 120; see Military Service.
— agricultural, 24 n., 45 n., 120.
— in socage, 45, 120.
— free and base, 45, 48, 117.
Servient tenement, 151.
Servitudes, 147–166.
Settled Land Act 1882, 136 n.
Settlement, 315, 316, 365.
Shack, common of, 6 n., 165 n.
Shelley's Case, rule in, 225.
Sheriff, 70.
Shifting uses, 268, 288, 316.
Socage, etymology of term, 45 n.
— tenure, 45–48, 120.
— free and villein, 45 n.
— descent of lands in, 46, 84–86.
— conversion of military tenures into, 351, 353, 354.
Socmanu, 45.
Special occupant, 136 n.
Specialty debts, 239.
Springing uses, 268, 288, 316.
Stapulia, Statutum de, 238.
Statute law, 97, 98.
Stillicidium, 263.
Strict settlement, 211 n.
Subinfeudation, abolition of, 191.
Subject of right, 256, 258.
Subpoena, writ of, 250, 278.
Substitution, 226.
Successio per universitatem, 336.
Succession, title by, 375–380.
Suffrage, tenant at, 200.
Suit of Court, 45 n., 120.
Surrender, 366.
Surrender of copyhold, 248, 251.
— to use of will, 252 n.
Survivorship, 232–234.
Tail, see Estate Tail.
— earliest mention of estate, 181, 188.
— male, female, 206.
— special, general, 205.
— after possibility of issue extinct, 206, 211.
— mode of barring estate, 207–213.
— alienation of estate, 207, 210, 211.
Tallarum's Case, 211–213.
INDEX.

Technical terms, 55-59.
Tenant in capite, see Capite.
Tenant in common, 234, 235, 236.
Tenements, 70 n., 182 n.
Tenendum, 59.
Tenure, growth of, 26, 31, 37, 48 n., 59.
— different kinds of, 117-122.
— after Qua Emptores, 192, 206.
Term, meaning of, 143 n., 201, 370 n.
Termor, see Lessee.
Terms of years, 143-147; see Leasehold Interests.
Terra regia, see Folkland.
— dominicas, 24.
Text-books, 100, 167, 196, 197.
Thegn-land, 13 n.
— law, 24 n.
Thegns, relation of, to king, 21, 25, 38.
— pass into tenants in capite, 29.
Thing, meaning of, 256 n.
Things real, personal, 259.
Thornton, Gilbert de, 168 n.
Time immemorial, 281, 365, 366.
Titles, 263.
Title, meaning of, 357.
Titles, classification of, 387.
Toll, writ of, 71 n.
Torts, 257 n.
Tourn of Sheriff, 54.
Township, 5.
— court of, see Village assembly.
Traders, liability of heir of deceased, 240.
Traditio, 124.
Transmutation of possession, uses raised with or without, 284, 311.
Trespass, action of, 294 n., 331.
— action of, by copyholder against lord, 250.
Trinoda necessitas, 13, 22, 35, 38.
Trustee, 312, 328.
Trusts, 304, 328.
— implied, 329.
— creation and transfer, mode of, 329, 372-374.
Turbary, common of, 155, 160.

U.
Underlease, 370.
Usage, influence of, 276.
User, extent of power of, over property, 261.
— early recognition of, 271, 274.
— advantages of, 274-276.
— nature of obligation constituting, 271, 276, 282.
— will of, 281, 286.
— who capable of holding to, 283.
— who capable of taking, 287, 289-291.
— follow legal rules, 283.
— creation and alienation of, 284-286.
— implied, 284.
— refusal of Common Law Courts to recognise, 294-296.
— conveyances by costul que use made good, 301.
— usual later sense of, 304.
— upon uses, 326-328, 331.
Uses, Statute of, 303-310.
— effects of, upon conveyancing, 310-320.
— upon wills, 334, 339.
Usus fructus, 146, 226, 273.

V.
Vestry of paroh, 8.
Vico-comes, see Sheriff.
Villa, 43.
Village assembly, 7, 15, 27, 57.
Village communities, 4.
Villenagium, 49-51, 119, 128-129, 245.
— purum, privilegiatum, 129.
— remedies of tenant in, 129, 130.
— alienation of, 130.
Villeins, 24 n., 49, 50.
— in gross, regardant, 50, 244 n.
— customary rights of, 50.
— different kinds of, 129, 130.
Vivum vadium, 240.
INDEX.

Voluntary gifts, void against purchasers, 363.

W.
Wards, Court of, 349.
— abolition of, 350-353.
Wardship, 41, 76, 78-81, 118, 351, 355, 356; see Guardian.
Warranty, 72 n., 127, 135, 179, 207-214.
Warranty, lineal, collateral, 208.
— vouching to, 72 n., 213 n.
Waste land, early rights over, 17, 18, 27, 115; see Lord.
Watercourses, 362.
Ways, 154, 263.
Widow, marriage of, 82, 111; see Dower.
Will of lands, introduced by clergy, 2 n.
— in Anglo-Saxon law, 14, 16, 26 n., 47.
— abolished after Conquest, 28, 88, 149, 333.
— customary, 47, 237, 337.
— of copyholds, 252 n.
— of use of lands, 281, 386, 333.
Will of Lands, effect of Statute of Uses on, 302-304, 309, 334, 339.
— effect of 2 Car. II, c. 24, 335.
— how it differs from will of personality, 336, 337.
— solemnities, 335.
— construction of, 339-341.
— speaks from death, 341.
— revocation of, 345, 347, 348.
— of married women, 296, 298, 347.
— of freeholds, leaseholds, copyholds, 274, 375.
Wills, Statutes of (Henry VIII), 343-346.
Wills Act, 346-348.
Witenagemot, 11.
Witnesses to will, credibility of, 335.
Writs, forms of (see various titles), 69, 70, 98, 162.
— new, provided by Council, 146.
Writs, new, under Statute of West. II, c. 24, 279.
— purchase of, 213.

Y.
Year Books, 167, 196.
Year to year, tenant from, 200, 369, 370.

THE END.